UNITARIAN FREE CHURCH, READING.

The want of a SCHOOL-ROOM has long been severely felt. Designs have now been prepared for a room with a class-room attached, built on to the church, at a cost (including land for frontage) of £720. This will be available for Lectures, Meetings, Classes, &c., as well as for more effective Sunday-school teaching. The project is warmly approved by the Provincial Assembly.

It is desired to put the work in hand at once if the necessary support be forthcoming.

The Committee therefore earnestly ask for the help of all who are interested in the religious education of the young.

Twelve Hymns and Their Writers:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES AND LESSON NOTES.

By Rev. VALENTINE D. DAVIS, B.A.

Cloth, 1s. net, postage 3d.

The plan of this little book was to select twelve hymns such as it would be good to learn by heart, and by different authors, whose lives would furnish matter for an interesting biographical sketch with some useful lesson in it, while the hymns also should provide material for further lessons.—From Preface.

The British Friend says:—"The sketches of character are delightful from the delicacy and taste with which the author delineates the trend of thought in each of his subjects. The Hymns are brief but well chosen, and well worth remembering for the thoughts they express."

The Christian Life says:—"The idea is excellent. . . . The hymns are not only suitable for children, but will be useful companions in their learner's mind throughout life."

"There are many good things in this book. Throughout there runs a strong vein of theism, healthy and optimistic."—CHRISTIAN LIFE.

"We sympathise to a great extent with the author's dissatisfaction with formal philosophy and conventional religion, and agree that Stoicism properly understood offers a better refuge for the human mind. Mr. Walker's philosophy is not pure stoicism, as it is modified by Christian Theism, and the combination is productive of a cheerful optimism. The author says many sensible things. The book ought to be popular, and we wish it success."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR columns this week are largely occupied by reports of important meetings, at which matters vitally affecting our whole religious community were dealt with. We would call special attention to the report of the meeting held in Birmingham on Oct. 1, which it was not possible for us to publish last week, in support of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund. The same subject was dealt with by Mr. David Martineau and Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke at the meeting of the Provincial Assembly at Essex Church on Tuesday, and other meetings have been held and are to be held in different parts of the country, as we have already announced, that the matter may be fully brought before the notice of the churches. It is encouraging to hear from the Treasurer of the Fund that so large a proportion of the £20,000 asked for as a capital sum is already promised; but to secure the remaining £5,500 before Christmas will require strenuous efforts, of which there will be no lack on the part of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, President of the National Conference, and other members of the special committee.

ANOTHER matter of very serious significance was the vote of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties on Tuesday to appoint a special committee on Public Questions. In the sermon preached at Horsham last year before the Assembly the Rev. F. K. Freeston urged the appointment of such a committee, and the suggestion was subsequently considered by the general committee of the Assembly, but left by them, as stated in their annual report, to be dealt with by the Assembly itself, if the annual meeting thought fit. On a question of such moment we confess that it would have seemed to us more satisfactory if notice of a motion had been given beforehand, that members might have come prepared, and the subject could have been more thoroughly discussed; but the annual meeting decided that the motion of the Rev. F. K. Freeston should be received, and it was passed, as will be seen from our report, by 44 votes against 33, there being 112 ministers and delegates present. The committee was then appointed, consisting of nine members, four of whom are laymen, four ministers and one a lady. This balance of powers was not due to premeditation, but arose spontaneously out of a somewhat hap-hazard process of nomination and withdrawal, to secure the requisite number without delaying the election to which the meeting was pledged, but the result seems to hold the promise of effective work.

IN view of this decision of the Assembly it may be well to recall what is the practice in this matter of the elder Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire. In appointing a special committee on public questions, the southern Assembly has adopted what was long the custom in the north; but three years ago it was decided at the annual meeting of the Lancashire Assembly not to re-appoint the special committee, but to ask the general committee, which was at the same time enlarged, to present annually a special report on public questions. The difference of procedure is no doubt important, but the vital point is that the Assembly, representing a body of churches, should, in the words of the resolution of Tuesday, "take cognisance of public and national questions in which moral and religious issues are involved."

REFERRING to our record of the annual meetings of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, we find that last June the subjects dealt with were Education and Temperance, but a motion was passed expressing regret that the report had not touched upon the subject of the War in South Africa, and a special meeting of the Assembly was subsequently held for that special purpose. In 1900 the war occupied the first place in the report, and how it was dealt with may be seen in THE INQUIRER of June 30 of that year. Licensing Reform and Education were the two other subjects considered. In 1899 the questions were the Nonconformist Marriage Act, the Free Church Catechism, with special reference to the use of parts of it by a School Board, Temperance and the Peace Conference at the Hague, and the Crisis in the Church, on which the committee was so far divided that two conflicting views were concurrently expressed. In 1898 the special committee did not report, and the change of procedure above referred to was made. In 1897 the Queen's Jubilee was the first subject, followed by the question of the Armenian Massacres, and the treatment of native races, especially in the matter of the sale of drink. In 1896 Education and the Sale of Drink to Children, the Armenian Massacres, and the question of International Arbitration were dealt with. And it must be noted that in connection with these annual reports, resolutions on the subjects judged to be of the most immediate public concern were proposed on behalf of the committee and dealt with by the Assembly.

WITHOUT going further back, these examples are enough to show what is the mind of the Northern Assembly, and in what light the members have conceived their duty as representing a body of churches pledged to the service of Christian truth and righteousness and the furtherance of the Kingdom of God on earth. Whether the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties is yet strong enough wisely and effectually to follow this example, time only can show. In the discussion on Tuesday the old difficulty of the introduction of politics was of course raised, but we are not aware that anyone has ever clearly defined where religion ends and politics begin. Mr. Smith Osler also stated the difficulty that members came as delegates of churches, and he for one could not undertake to represent his congregation by any vote on such questions. It will be for the constituent churches of the Assembly to say whether they consent to be represented in a body which touches on such questions, and attempts in its corporate capacity to bring the influence of religion to bear upon social and national questions. But if the plea is urged that the Assembly's time is already fully occupied with other business, then if this be a vital matter with us as a religious people, more time must be made, either by a rearrangement of business or the holding of more than one meeting in the course of a year.

AT the Autumnal Assembly of the Baptist Union at Edinburgh on Wednesday, the Rev. Dr. Maclaren, of Manchester, delivered his Presidential Address, taking for his subject, "Evangelical Mysticism." Mysticism, he said, was a word of somewhat doubtful reputation, but a sane and wholesome mysticism entered into every lofty view of the world and was at the heart of Christianity.

The central principle of mysticism, rightly understood, was simply the direct communion of the human with the Divine spirit, and they all admitted in theory, at least, that that truth was shrined in the very holy of holies of their faith. Those to whom Christianity was mainly the republication in loftier form and with more heart-affecting sanctions of the purest morality, and those to whom it was mainly a system of reasoned dogma, might and would turn from this with a shrug of distaste; but as long as the truth of an indwelling Spirit stood in the forefront of New Testament teaching, and as long as the insight of a pure heart led into a region far above that to which ethics and reasoning carried, so long would the mystical element enter into all living Christian experience, and be a fundamental part of Christian belief.

For our own part we should say that ethics, when fully understood, led directly to that holy of holies in which the reverent and humble soul becomes aware of the indwelling Spirit; and in such conviction we should find the true guidance through those intellectual difficulties which Dr. Maclaren seems to imply are felt by many Christians nowadays, in connection with the teaching of the "Indwelling Christ." "Christ" they say, but we, with Jesus, would say "Father," and certainly confess the presence of the Holiest, the one Eternal Spirit.

The first of Mr. Stopford Brooke's course of five lectures on the "Poetry of Matthew Arnold and some Contemporary Poets" is to be given in the Botanical Theatre of University College, on Thursday evening, the 31st inst. Free tickets for this course, of which there will be not less than 300, will be issued to applicants in order of application, to be made on or after (and not before) Oct. 20. A limited number of tickets for the course may be had at 10s. 6d. each. Application for these should be made before Oct. 20. There are also a few reserved platform tickets to be had at £1 1s. for the course. All applications are to be addressed to the Hon. Sec., Stopford Brooke Lectures, University College, London. It should be noted that the donations so far received are not sufficient to establish the Stopford Brooke Lectureship permanently, so that those who pay for tickets may feel that they are so far helping the Fund, and further donations may be sent to the Hon. Treasurer, Mrs. David Limond, 18, Kensington-square, W., or paid direct to the Lectureship account, London and Westminster Bank, Kensington High-street Branch, W. The Chairman of the Lectureship Committee is Dr. Odgers, K.C.; the Hon. Secs., Mr. C. Herbert Smith, 3, Elm-court, Temple, E.C., and Miss Kate M. Warren, 8, Balcombe-street, Dorset-square, N.W.

The Christian Register of Sep. 19 incorporates for the first time a "Monthly Bulletin" of the A.U.A, with the title "Unitarian Word and Work." This twelve-page supplement is issued by the Association, whose officers and not the editor of the Register, are responsible for its contents. This first monthly supplement contains notes of present missionary activities, and an historical account of the Association, illustrated by portraits and a picture of the old Federal-street Church in Boston. There are also articles on the S.S. Society, the Women's National Alliance, and the Young People's Union. The Rev. C. W. Wendté contributes an article on the International Council, with which goes also a separate full-page reproduction of the International group at St. Ermin's Hotel.

MISSIONS IN OUR OWN CHURCHES.

The Roman Catholic Church has long known the value of missions in connection with its various places of worship, and during the last forty years the example it has set has been imitated by orthodox Protestants. We have been slow to follow along the same track. The mission conducted at Bridport a fortnight ago by the Rev. C. Hargrove is not quite the first of its kind among us. Similar services were lately carried on at Richmond by the Rev. E. Daplyn, and some of our readers may be able to supply instances elsewhere. But, practically, we have a new departure in connection with our own body, and the question of vigorously adopting this particular method of deepening our faith, as well as of spreading our opinions, deserves careful consideration.

We have been in the habit of supposing that our mission work lies entirely outside our established, independent congregations. We support our "Home Missions," which seek to carry the gospel to the poorest inhabitants of our large cities. Apart from this, we have considered that missionary work consists in giving Unitarian lectures in places where there is no Unitarian chapel, and then, having gathered together a few adherents, helping them to build a place of worship and support a minister. Of course, this is missionary work; but we have learned, through disastrous failure in some cases, and the absence of any progress in other cases, that it is not work to be lightly undertaken. We incur serious responsibility when we go into a fresh district and unsettle men's minds, still more so when we first start regular Unitarian worship. Those who are the first to join our cause have to break with many old associations and cut themselves off from much that may have been to them real religious help. When we have made our start with those who are sufficiently brave and attach sufficient importance to veracity in religion to join us, we cannot desert them so long as there seems any prospect of life and growth. So we are rightly cautious in our attempts to break new ground; and in many districts our missionary work has come to a standstill, or consists solely in raising a very moderate amount of money for the assistance of our weaker congregations.

Now, what our stronger congregations ought to realise is the urgent need for undertaking distinct missionary work in connection with their own places of worship, where there is already the building, and the religious society that is, or ought to be, ready to offer spiritual sympathy and fellowship. Everyone of our congregations steadily loses its members, loses them by death and removal if not in ways less inevitable; and no church is a living church which has not the power to lay hold on outsiders, especially young people, and bring them into its own inner fellowship. We ought to realise, more than we do, that this renewal and building up of a church is not an automatic process which can be trusted to go on by itself, as children grow up in the Sunday-school and in the families of the members of the congregation. We ought also to realise that it will not be done efficiently by an occasional course of doctrinal lectures given on Sunday evenings by the minister of the place.

All this was realised at Bridport when the invitation was given many months ago, and when it could at last be accepted and carried out by Mr. Hargrove. The arrangements made were very simple. The place and the subject of each address was well announced by means of posters, handbills, and advertisements. But no attempt was now made to draw larger numbers by means of instrumental music or solo singing. For the first night the Town Hall was engaged, and the address was on "Unitarianism, the Universal Faith: What we agree on, and where we differ." The hall was well filled, the short devotional service was impressive, and a very beautiful, stimulating address was listened to with deep attention. The following three nights the services were continued in the chapel, and the diminished attendance afforded the usual proof that people will come to a public hall who will not come to a denominational chapel. This had been foreseen, and it had been deliberately decided that a smaller number in the chapel was preferable to the larger number made up from those who would not venture to cross an heretical threshold. So on these nights the congregations were almost entirely Unitarian, and, with very few exceptions, the regular attenders at the chapel and Sunday-school. The three addresses were on "The Conviction of Sin and its Forgiveness," "The Imitation of Jesus Christ," and "Heaven and Hell of our own making." One of the noteworthy features of all four addresses was the way in which Mr. Hargrove made his hearers feel the value of Unitarian theology, while he avoided all mere controversialism, and never let them forget that they were engaged in a religious service, not come to listen to a doctrinal disputation.

On the Sunday Mr. Hargrove preached the Sunday-school sermons, and the scholars sang their special hymns; and on the Monday there was the usual tea-party and public meeting which form part of this anniversary. These sermons and addresses would alone have made Mr. Hargrove's visit memorable. Coming when they did the effect of what had gone before was not to draw larger numbers on the concluding occasions, but it undoubtedly was to make a very deep impression on those who had come on all or most of the previous evenings. It is something to get a single Unitarian to attend a single week-night service. So rarely does he do it that he regards it as a considerable feat, whether in prospect or as an achievement. Well, to have brought out a goodly number of Unitarians to attend four week-night services in succession, and to be delighted with every one of them, must mean a good deal. Of course, it is idle yet to talk of results—real results—the only results for which it was worth making the effort. But something has been done which ought to set other congregations thinking, and our ecclesiastical organisations planning how to overcome difficulties, if it is felt that this form of missionary work is an urgent need. Assuredly, it is only the right man who can do it; but before we say that we have not the right men available, let us seek them in the right spirit.

H. S. S.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

The annual meeting of the Assembly was held at Essex Church, Kensington, on Tuesday, and was largely attended. The roll-call showed 112 ministers and delegates from the fifty-one congregations included in the Province, together with lay-preachers and personal members, while a large number of other members of congregations were present during the day.

At the morning service Essex Church was not crowded, but there was a very good congregation. The service was conducted by the Rev. G. Dawes Hicks, M.A., Ph.D., of Unity Church, Islington, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

THE SERMON: "THE POWER OF THE HOLY SPIRIT."

The text was from Romans xv. 13, "That ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Spirit," and the sermon was an earnest plea for reliance in our religious life on the present enlightenment and quickening power of the Spirit. There was no other ultimate authority, the preacher said, to which they could appeal. Standing in the line of the old prophets, they must simply speak the truth as it was made clear to them, and their only strength in the last resort must be that of the Spirit. As they tried to attain to the simple Christianity of Jesus they must remember how he swept away the old authorities and limitations of the religious life of his people, so that there remained only that quite convinced Son of God, that Teacher of the deep things of the Spirit. And so with themselves, gone was the priest, gone were sacraments as miraculous channels of God's grace, gone were creeds and Church authority, and infallible scripture. To the members of the great orthodox Churches their position was incomprehensible. They appeared to be an anomalous group of sceptical atoms; but what was the truth as to their position, what was the sole ground on which they rested? Their reliance was on the Spirit of God. With all humility they must make that greatest claim, but not without remembrance of how often they had turned aside from obedience to that inward Voice. They had not been equal to their high ideal, and the weakness of their church life showed it. Often in preaching a minister would go home well pleased, feeling that he had interested the people. But then came the question, Had he been in the Spirit, had he helped a single soul? They could not do their work or speak their word, except by the power of the Spirit.

It was so from the beginning, from the very time of Christ and before that. In the Book of Acts they saw how in the early Church it was clearly acknowledged that they could do nothing without the Spirit. And Paul's power came not from what any disciples had told him, but from the life within himself. "God revealed his son in me." And so it always was. In the inward life with God was the true power. The old story of Pentecost was still true. The coming of the Spirit was elemental and perennial. In every age the Spirit had been poured on men, and had guided them into the life that knows not death or failure.

It was their great need in the present time, in the midst of materialist and worldly ideals. Through patient service, living as near as they might to the peace of the Holiest, they must seek for the power of the Spirit. Too often they were ready to pander to the world but their whole religious work for the world, must be to spiritualise earth. In the power of the Spirit they were rooted on that which is infinite, the eternal Rock of Ages, and declared what they had seen and heard, what they knew and had handled of the Word of Life.

Whoso has felt the Spirit of the Highest Cannot confound nor doubt Him nor deny:
Yea with one voice, O world, tho' thou deniest,
Stand thou on that side, for on this am I.

The collection for the Funds of the Association amounted to £17 12s. 9d., as compared with £15 17s. 6d. at Horsham last year.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

At one o'clock lunch was served in the Elysée Art Gallery, Queen's-road, and in the afternoon the business meeting was held in the schoolroom at Essex Church, the President, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., in the chair.

The roll was called by the Secretary, the Rev. Frederic Allen, and Mr. P. W. Ames, who is now in charge of the Stepney congregation, and Messrs. W. J. Hawkins and E. Wilkes Smith as lay-preachers were admitted as members of the Assembly.

Mr. Walter Baily, as treasurer, presented the accounts, which were substantially as last year, but with a balance on a total of £610 14s. 9d. increased from £85 9s. 11d. to £98 8s. 4d. Annual subscriptions amounted to £122 2s., collections and donations to £160 2s. 10d., and grants for the minister-at-large and aided churches from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association £182 10s. The total grants to churches amounted to £170, and £20 was spent on the effort at Sydenham.

Lady Wilson also presented the accounts of the Postal Mission, and the President announced, on behalf of the Rev. J. Harwood, that the Advisory Committee had happily nothing to report.

The Committee's report opened with a reference to the great success of the meeting at Horsham last year, and recorded the result of its consideration of the suggestions made by the Rev. F. K. Freeston in the annual sermon. As to the appointment of a Committee on Public Questions no suggestion was made, except that the annual meeting should "take action if it think fit." The result of Sunday evening services at Sydenham had not encouraged a continuance of that effort, and the "forlorn hope" of establishing congregations at Margate, Ramsgate, and Eastbourne had been abandoned. The Rev. S. G. Preston's week evening lectures in a suburb of Hastings, in spite of the difficulties of local opposition, were to be continued. At Southend, where the church had been put in trust, Mr. C. F. Dear's services were much appreciated. At Bermondsey, though the hope of a self-supporting church had been abandoned by the London District Unitarian Society, the work had been carried on during the winter by Mr. E. Howard, and it was now under the care of the minister-at-large. So was Walthamstow, where the removal of Mr. Ginever had left the work at a low ebb. At Wood Green the new church was approaching completion, and the Reading congregation was about to build a schoolroom. At Billingshurst the committee had provided the Rev. G. Lansdown with a bicycle, to facilitate his work in the neighbouring village of Wisborough. At Halstead services had been held fortnightly throughout the year. Sympathetic reference was made to the death of the Rev. C. L. Corkran and Mrs. Brooke Herford, and the retirement of Dr. Herford from active service. Of him it was said in conclusion:—"The message that Dr. Herford, in season and out of season, has striven—and with conspicuous success—to give to our churches in this land and on the other side of the Atlantic, has been that of 'Courage and cheer.' May he receive again 'into his own bosom' of the plentiful blessings he has brought all around him!"

The President moved the adoption of the reports, and Mr. Edwin Ellis, in seconding, quoted the remark that a man who does not make failures as a rule does not make anything, and said that they must not be discouraged in their efforts. He spoke very highly of the services of Mr. Edwards, who was in touch with so many of their churches, and strongly urged that the effort at Bermondsey must not be abandoned.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston asked whether a resolution as to the appointment of a Committee on Public Questions could be admitted, and after a short discussion it was decided that a resolution should be taken at the conclusion of the business on the agenda paper, and the reports were adopted.

The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards then presented his report as minister-at-large, and spoke particularly of the difficulties which had to be faced at Walthamstow and Bermondsey. At the latter place they must realise that their ordinary Sunday services would not attract the people. It was necessary to adopt new methods and new kinds of teaching. The indifference of the people of Bermondsey and of East London generally to religion was put down to various causes, but the real reason he was convinced was that the working men felt the insincerity of religious professors, who told lies and ground the poor. Until there was a higher spiritual life and a fuller manifestation of moral principle in church-goers they would not attract the people or see the Kingdom of God advanced in the east of London or anywhere else.

Mr. J. Harrison, of Brixton, was then elected President, and the other officers and Committee were appointed.

Mrs. Farrington was elected President of the Postal Mission, in succession to the late Mrs. Brooke Herford.

The Advisory Committee was reappointed, with the new President in place of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

On the invitation of the Rev. S. G. Preston, who, however, explained that he had not yet been able to consult with his congregation on the subject, the hope was expressed that the Assembly might meet next year at Hastings.

The Rev. G. Dawes Hicks was appointed preacher, and the Rev. J. J. Marten supporter for 1902.

The President then offered a welcome to the representatives of the B. and F.U.A., the L.D.U.S., the Central Postal Mission, the S.S.A., and the General Baptist Assembly, who were present.

Miss Tagart, as President of the C. P. Mission, in response, spoke of her recent visit to Hungary, where she had been specially glad to go as representing their only central Women's Society, and to have opportunities of speaking on women's work. The succession of Hungarian students at Manchester College had been of great advantage to their country, and the kindness of Miss Sharpe in receiving lady students from Hungary at Channing House School had also borne good fruit.

The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth also responded, and spoke hopefully of the prospects of the G. B. Assembly.

The Rev. C. P. Lombard, of Plymouth, U.S., in response to a cordial word of welcome from the President, also spoke. "Old Plymouth," he said, they called it at home, because it was the oldest parish in New England, with many historical associations; but standing there he felt that they were very new. Yet coming from Italy, where he had spent the winter, he felt at once at home. It was a great contrast, leaving the ancient churches of Rome, to come into contact with the Waldensians of Piedmont, who had given him a cordial welcome, as an American minister, and whom, in spite of many differences, he felt to be one with themselves in spirit. Then, after visiting some of their own churches in the South of England, he felt yet closer at home. He realised the peculiar difficulties in this country, where in some places they were overshadowed by the Cathedral, or amid the whirl and bustle of mighty London. But, after the service that morning, he felt that they had the same spirit of power and abiding conviction of a grand, free, and beautiful faith as in his own country, and held to the same principles in Old England that were dearest to their hearts.

The President then delivered his address, in which he spoke of the benefits derived from their Assembly in bringing the congregations of the province together, so that they had learnt to know one another and take an interest in their common work, as never before. Holding to the ideal of catholicity in religion they were yet a people practically of one mind in theology, and when they established a new church they determined the sort of teaching that should be given. Referring to the Ministers' Superannuation scheme, he touched on what was due to those who grew old in the service, and to young men who should be encouraged to take up the work, but added a very earnest plea for those who were bearing in middle life the heat and burden of the day, and reminded his hearers that it rested with the laity to call out by encouragement and sympathy what was best in their ministers. The new Guilds' Union, of which as a convert he spoke in warm commendation, he believed had a splendid prospect before it, in taking the children, as they grew up in school and home, and making them feel that they were co-workers with their elders in the church. As to the work at Bermondsey, if they said the people of that district were hopeless, then they themselves were hopeless. They must adapt themselves to the environment. If they could not by any means make those people feel that there was something worthy to live for, and realise the blessedness of helping and being helped, then they were indeed a lost people and need not speak of Christianity any more. But they must find some way of helping, to make the people feel that God is Father, and that brotherhood may prevail. There were those who had not done much in such work, others who perhaps had tired of the old work. Others again satisfied themselves by giving a subscription. A magistrate might let them off with a fine, but they could not so let themselves off. To the true life of their churches they might apply the saying, "If a man will not work neither shall he eat." So it was that there were within their churches so many starving souls. They must arise, and in self-devoted service take hold of the better life.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston then moved:—

That a Special Committee of this Assembly, consisting of five persons, be appointed to-day, to be called the Public Questions Committee, the object of which shall be to take cognisance of public and national questions in which moral and religious issues are involved, and report thereon to the Assembly.

Mr. Freeston at an earlier stage had referred to the great interest and importance attached to the work of such a committee in connection with the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and the Rev. H. S. Perris, in seconding the motion, pleaded strongly that unless as members of churches they showed that they had practical concern with such questions they stultified their religion.

Mr. A. Bakewell opposed on the ground that political questions should not be introduced in that Assembly, and that such subjects were properly discussed in the newspapers and at public meetings called for that specific purpose.

Mr. T. Smith Osler, while recognising the importance of the questions suggested, hoped that the resolution would not be passed. They were there as delegates of congregations, and he felt that on such questions he could not speak on behalf of the congregation he represented.

After further discussion in which the Rev. F. H. Jones, Messrs. Edwin Ellis, C. F. Dear, E. Capleton and others took part, the resolution, with nine substituted for five as the number of the committee, was carried by 44 votes against 33. The following were then elected as the Public Questions Committee:—Mr. J. Harrison (President), Miss Florence Hill, the Revs. F. K. Freeston, F. H. Jones, H. S. Perris, P. H. Wicksteed, Messrs. A. Bakewell, W. J. Cowan and W. Blake Odgers.

THE POSTAL MISSION.

After tea at the Elysée Art gallery an organ recital was given in the church by Mr. Albert Joll, Miss Minnie Chamberlain also singing two solos. At the same time the annual meeting of the South-Eastern Counties Postal Mission was held in one of the vestries, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant in the chair.

On the motion of Miss Tagart the following resolution was passed:—

The members of the Postal Mission Committee of the London and S.E. Counties Provincial Assembly take this opportunity of expressing their sorrow at the loss of their late president, Mrs. Brooke Herford, whose invaluable labours for the Postal Mission, both in England and America, they hold in grateful memory.

Lady Wilson, the secretary, presented her report of the year's work, which was followed by an interesting conversation, chiefly on methods of advertising.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

At the public meeting in the schoolroom, the chair was taken by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, minister of Essex Church, who, after an opening hymn, explained that they had hoped to secure as chairman one of their leading laymen, but had not succeeded. He had first asked Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, the first president of that Assembly, but he, while expressing unabated interest in the Assembly, regretted that he could not be present. In the course of his letter, which the Chairman read, Mr. Nettlefold said:—

The older I grow the more do I feel confirmed in the importance, nay the necessity, of such work as the Assembly endeavours to perform. In these times, when Imperialism wrongfully claims to be the only true Patriotism, and relies for its support on principles which seem to be utterly at variance with the teachings of Jesus, it is incumbent upon all who claim to be Christians that they should make their influence felt as widely as possible, and declare that righteousness, and not lust of power, exalteth a nation. It seems to me that all who acknowledge no authority either spiritual or temporal in the pastors of their churches should be especially free from those domineering opinions which are all too rife at the present day. Most heartily therefore am I in accord with such Associations as the Provincial Assembly, which seeks to found and maintain churches, claiming no authority over their members, and relies for union among them solely on the covenant of love, mercy and forgiveness as declared by a belief in the fatherhood of God, the discipleship of Jesus and the exercise of the individual conscience.

Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., also wrote regretting his inability to be present, and said:—

I feel more and more keenly as time goes on the necessity of supporting our institutions and of standing by each other generally. It is to my mind infinitely pitiful that differences of opinion on Home Rule and the South African War should separate us on the question of a simple Christianity.

Proceeding with his address the Chairman said that the Assembly had been founded in 1889 as a direct outcome of Dr. Martineau's plea for closer organisation among their churches, in which the strong should help the weak. They claimed no shred of ecclesiastical authority.

Their concern as an Assembly was with the things that make churches, that build up congregational life; their concern was with the spiritual well-being of the congregations, with efforts on behalf of the young people, with efforts on behalf of the ministry of the churches, and with the conviction that their churches should never be ashamed to utter forth their voice at national times of moral crisis. That was the line of their work and their hope; and even in the day of small things they dared to uplift the ideal of catholicity. Their deepest prayer and their most strenuous work should be for the good estate of the universal church.

The Rev. H. Gow, of Leicester, then gave an address on "Our Hopes and Ideals" as regards religious life, and began by asking what they desired that the religious life of England should become? Other churches, such as the Roman or Anglican, might desire that the whole country should be conformed to them, but they did not want the whole of England to become "Unitarian" or "Free Christian." They had no final and fixed creed, but only germinal principles which could not change. They felt that all churches working sincerely according to their light were tending with them to some higher truth. It was that to which they must look, as to a goal far beyond them all. They longed for a deeper sympathy among all the churches. They did not expect all to think alike, but they might expect and hope and pray for the time when the deep things on which they were agreed would be felt to be fundamental and the other things comparatively insignificant. But they must always bear in mind that it was easier for them than for their orthodox brethren to feel so, just as it was easier for Robert Elsmere to sympathise with Catherine, but frightfully difficult for the woman, however much she loved and reverenced her husband, with her orthodox beliefs, to feel any unity with him. They could only succeed with their orthodox brethren on some such lines as Elsmere's, by winning their love, making them feel the reality of their religion. They must have much more patience, for only through self-sacrifice and love could they ever bring that high ideal to pass. Asking further what was the prevailing character of the time, he said it was a kindly agnosticism, as in the time of the old Roman Empire, and they wanted some of the fresh, deep life that came in those days out of Galilee, and they must be ready to welcome it, from whatever quarter it might come. One thing they might say of the religion of the future—it must be in accord with facts. Accordance with fact would not make it religion, or give it power; they themselves had been putting facts into other people's religion, rather than putting religion into their own facts. They had a certain love of facts, delight in the scientific and historical revelations of their time, and it was necessary that religion should be in accord with these facts, which the orthodox creed was not. But in their religion there must be the power to feel that they faced the facts with joy, with a sense of the Divine in the facts of common life. There must be in it selfless devotion and spiritual energy. They must have a religion that sees God's love as well as God's thought in the present time as much as in the past.

Mr. David Martineau spoke of the Superannuation Fund explaining its purpose, to enable ministers to provide valuable securities for old age or for their families in case of death which, without such aid, might not be within their reach. It would in no way be an interference between ministers and congregations or with the independence of ministers. They had received a very generous response to their appeal, but there was still much to be made up to secure the capital sum required, and they were now appealing for a great number of small donations, all of which would be valuable, as helping to the end they aimed at.

Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, as Treasurer of the Fund, stated that they still required £5,500 to secure the £20,000 which they hoped to raise by Christmas, in order to establish the Fund; and also £100 of the £300 annual subscriptions needed. The Fund, he said, was for ministers, but it was largely also for the benefit of their churches, and it was a matter in which all should help.

The Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, then gave an address on "The Duties of our Churches to the Young." The young, he said, live in a world of romance and make-believe, walking among mists and rainbows, passionate after dreams and unconcerned about what we call facts. The religion of childhood must be something different from that of manhood. The religion of a little child was one thing and a very beautiful thing, but a child's imitation of a man's religion was far from beautiful. The light should grow on the child's consciousness like the dawn, and it must not be robbed of its childhood. Religion must be accommodated to the child's powers of imagination, to the spirit of romance, which plays so large a part in its life. In the religious education of children they must beware of mere knowledge-grinding. The calling out of thought and strengthening of character was something different from the putting in of facts. Nor could religious education be exactly defined as the formation of character. It was the formation of those habits, instincts, enthusiasms, affections, predispositions, which should give character its bent and bias in the days to come. In their Sunday-schools the chief thing was not instruction but inspiration. They themselves were apt to think that duty must be the master fact in religion. But children could not understand Duty. Duties they understood, but not Duty, which was so great a power in the religion of their elders. The best way with children was to appeal to their affections, to their loyalty and romantic enthusiasm. As John Bright said, that you could not pitch the moral ideal too high for a popular audience, so it was with children. They had no difficulty in believing in God and the Sermon on the Mount as a practical rule of life. The great thing was to teach the children that God is love. In conclusion, Mr. Wood earnestly commended the habit of attendance at public worship, children and parents together, as the most effective influence on the child's religious life, and pleaded for the Guild idea, as supplying a real want in the growing life of young people.

Mr. Harold Wade, speaking on the subject, "Are Sunday-schools a Failure?" quoted from the letter in the Daily News, which had given rise to a long discussion, and said that such a question, if they looked at the actual results of their school work, could not, in his opinion, be seriously asked. There might be much room for improvement in the equipment and devotion of teachers, and in the attitude of the church to the school. More could be done also in keeping in touch with the children during the week. But it only needed more conscientiousness and more zeal to be put into the work to make it impossible that such a question should be asked again.

Mr. John Harrison, President Elect, was the last speaker, as the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas was prevented at the last moment from coming. Mr. Harrison thanked the members of the Assembly for his election, which he accepted as a great honour, and as the son of a minister, descended from a long line of ministers, expressed his deep interest in the work of the churches and his unabated loyalty in the principles they inherited from their fathers. He also added a word of pleading for the Superannuation Fund.

A cordial vote of thanks to the Chairman, and to the Essex Church congregation for their reception of the Assembly, was moved by the Rev. F. Allen, and carried by acclamation. Mr. Freeston having acknowledged the vote, the singing of the doxology and the benediction brought a very helpful meeting to a close.

THE MEDIÆVAL CHRONICLER IN ENGLAND.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

III.

William FitzStephen.

London at this time had its heroes and chroniclers, as well as its happy burger-life, and also great natural and architectural beauty which are described by William FitzStephen in the preface to his "Life" of his friend Thomas Beket. He had good reason to speak of "the most noble City of London," with its Norman cathedral and "thirteen larger conventual churches," including Rahere's St. Bartholomew, St. Mary Overy, and the Confessor's Westminster, its one hundred and twenty-six parish churches—all Norman or Saxon buildings—its Tower and Bridge and Walls and "seven double gateways," its palace and hall of Westminster, its gabled timber-houses and stone-dwellings in the same architecture as the castles and churches, its monastic schools and three colleges, its pure, "fish-bearing" Thames, its water-mills and gardens and wells, its festivals, miracle-plays, sports and music, and, what especially took the fancy of the writer, its "public cook-shop" and great horse-fair, where "earls, barons, knights, and many citizens come to see and buy." So pleased is FitzStephen with the metropolis that he declares it has only two "pests"—namely, "the immoderate drinking of fools," and the "frequency of fires."

Beket Literature.

Though Thomas Beket himself has no place in literature, he was the occasion of a good deal of writing. Besides FitzStephen, Benedict (who built the nave of Peterborough minster), William of Canterbury, John of Salisbury, Alan of Tewkesbury, Edward Grim, and Herbert of Bosham wrote of his life or miracles. He was then, and for a long time, an interesting and popular subject. FitzStephen believed that St. Paul's Cathedral in London would become the archiepiscopal see, unless the fame of St. Thomas the Martyr secured Canterbury in that distinction. But to a modern reader, perhaps, not the least attraction of the Beket biographies is the picture they contain of mediæval society on its way to the martyr's tomb—lords and ladies, monks and clerks, sailors, merchants and physicians, tradesmen's wives, handicraftsmen and shepherds, jesters and lepers, dumb, lame, and blind—the pilgrim company afterwards immortalised by Chaucer.

Gervase of Canterbury.

One Canterbury writer ranks above the rest, though he is for his time and opportunities peculiarly monkish and limited in his outlook. Gervase spent his life at the centre of ecclesiastical England, and the gathering-place of much secular news as well; but he was absorbed in the doings of his monastery. He was a quiet, stay-at-home, simple-minded person, who wrote a Chronica dealing chiefly with the fate of Beket and the long struggle between the monks and the archbishop. He also produced a history of the Archbishops of Canterbury, in which he did not hesitate to use strong language of Baldwin, and in which he speaks of a "Master Vacarius" who, in the primacy of Theobald (1139-1161) "lectured on law at Oxford." This is the earliest reference to an English university. Another work by Gervase is an account of the burning of the cathedral in 1174 and its reconstruction at the east-end to its present form. The great choir which he saw rise is what we now look upon, with its remarkable mixture of Norman and Early English taste, and strange narrowing behind the altar. He describes how the old work, as far as possible, was preserved, how the Norman pillars were lengthened and their capitals richly decorated, and the new arches—of the new pointed style—raised upon them, with addition of marble shafts, and how the contraction was made to save the old Norman towers, one of which was Anselm's. Further, he records that on the death, by a fall of scaffolding, of the architect, William of Sens, "another William, an Englishman," succeeded him, "a little man in body but skilled in all kinds of crafts, and upright."

Crusade Literature.

A scarcely less popular subject for literature than the Canterbury martyr, though widely different from him, was the hero of the crusade, King Richard of the Lion Heart. At least three contemporary narratives of his expedition found their way into our chronicles, and they are good reading.

The Itinerarium of Cœur de Lion.

The Itinerarium Regis Ricardi, ascribed to Richard, Canon of the Holy Trinity in London, who was in the service of the Knights Templars, is a very stirring volume, full of incident and character and brilliant colouring. It is a book of adventures and travels by land and sea, of sieges, hand-to-hand encounters and hair-breadth escapes, with glimpses of ancient cities, towers and bridges and ships, armour and dress, quaint customs and proverbs, and much evidence of the inconsistencies—the extremes of magnanimity and treachery, the important and the trivial—which belong to the medieval temper. But before all stands out the figure of the King, one of the ideal captains of chivalry. Richard may have been a bad son, a bad husband, and a bad king, but he was as fearless as a lion, a born warrior, open-handed and magnificent, without suspicion or revenge. We see him in the weeds of peace—on the prow of his ship entering a harbour, amid flags and shields and trumpets, and on his Spanish charger a blaze of gold and silver and scarlet; but we see him also fighting for life in the midst of the foe, and in a storm at sea, unmoved amid the confusion, encouraging his men by his words, and his fleet by a light at the mast-head. He was always first in the attack, whether from his barge or on horse-back. "He was not less than Roland for valour," says the writer; "in physique he was tall, and gracefully built; his hair was between red and auburn; his limbs were supple and straight—his arms rather long and matchless for wielding or striking with a sword, his legs in proportion to his whole frame."

Ralph of Coggeshall.

Unfortunately the Itinerarium concludes, somewhat abruptly, with the departure of the King from the Holy Land in 1192; but the journey homeward, through Germany, with its troubles, is recorded, in a manner at least worthy of the Itinerarium, in the Chronicon Anglicanum of the Cistercian Ralph of Coggeshall, who had as his informant the King's chaplain and companion, one Anselm.

Richard of Devizes.

Some useful facts in the expedition are contributed, with an abundance of sarcastic wit, by Richard of Devizes in his De Rebus Gestis Ricardi, from which I have already quoted a reference to the new London municipality. Richard's racy comments are the leading feature of the book. He begins with a mocking letter to a prior who had left his (the author's) monastery at Winchester for the reformed Carthusian house at Witham, congratulating him on the piety with which he never put foot over his threshold without leaving a foot behind. Then he thrusts right and left at people and things in general—at the King, for so "loving his country that in the first year of his reign, for Christ's sake, he turned his back upon it and, for aught he knew, never to return to it"; at the Dowager Queen Eleanor, for her "beauty and chastity"; at Longchamp, "a second Jacob, though he never wrestled with an angel"; at the French, by whom the King was burdened in the East "like a cat with a hammer tied to its tail;" at London, of which Richard, as a Winchester man, was jealous for its frivolities, and at Winchester for its sleepiness—Winchester "never did anything in haste, fearing nothing so much as to repent"; at Oxford for its underfed clerks, Bath, buried in a dense atmosphere, Worcester, abounding in Welsh, York in Scots, Durham and Lincoln and Norwich because in these cities none can speak French, and so on, in a similar caustic vein. He belongs more to the satirists, to Walter Map and Gerald of Wales, than to the author of the Itinerarium or Ralph of Coggeshall.

The Court Satirists.

In the lively company of Map and Gerald we move freely beyond monastic walls, through courts and castles and university class-rooms, and in royal or episcopal progresses; and in Gerald especially we recognise the quick pulse and the twinkling eye of the Kelt.

Walter Map.

Walter Map was a Westcountryman with more than a dash of Welsh blood in his veins. During the civil war the Welsh had supported the Empress rather than the English Stephen, and Map's family had been on her side. This fact, perhaps, made his ready wit the more welcome at the court of her son Henry II. He was born about 1140, studied at Paris, and was familiar as a young man in the household of Beket. His Golias poetry associates him with Oxford, where he afterwards became archdeacon. Some verses of his, removed from their context, became popular as a rollicking drinking-song—the well-known "Mihi propositum in taberna mori"—and have given the wrong impression that he was light-headed as well as lively. But underneath his wit is an unmistakable earnestness. French romances of "Arthur" and the "Holy Graal" have been ascribed to him, which are full of eucharistic symbolism and religious feeling; and though modern scholarship has questioned his authorship, it has not disproved it. He was evidently a brilliant conversationalist and man of the world, with a discretion and a reticence of which the talkative, not to say garrulous, Gerald was quite incapable. Henry II. disliked Gerald, but took pleasure in the society of Map, and made him one of his judices ambulantes who accompanied him on his journeys through the country. Out of such experience grew Map's book De Nugis Curialium, or "Court Gossip," which contains a valuable sketch of Court doings from Rufus to Henry II. It is full of good thought and good stories, from Royal dinner-table conversations to country fairy tales. Let me illustrate Map's work with a piece of ancient folk-lore, which many a sober old chronicler would have thought beneath his notice.

The Story of Herle.

The story of "Herle" is first met with in the Peterborough (English) Chronicle, where the writer apologises for speaking of it. It is referred to again by Orderic. Map gives it at length. Herle was King of the Britons before the English invasion. One day the Devil met him in the shape of a pigmy riding on a goat, with ruddy face, big head, long red beard, and a fawn skin thrown over his shaggy body. Not knowing who he was Herle accepted his promise to attend him on his wedding-day in return for a like civility. So when Herle married the Frankish King's daughter, the pigmy and his train arrived laden with gold and jewels, and surprised the guests by their pressing services. A year later the pigmy came to demand the fulfilment of the compact, and Herle followed him, with suitable gifts, to a dwelling in a cave in the forest. After three days have passed in festivity, Herle bids him farewell and returns with horses and hounds and other marks of the pigmy's favour. He also receives, as a present, a blood-red lap-dog, with the command not to get down from his horse until the dog has leapt from the man who carries it. On reaching the mouth of the cave, Herle is stupefied to learn from a peasant that his queen is dead, and his country in the hands of Saxons, and that two hundred years have gone by since his departure. Dismounting in their astonishment some of his men immediately turn to dust. On pain of death the rest are forbidden to move until the dog shall jump. But, would you believe it, to this day the dog has never jumped. And therefore, as a punishment for making a compact with the Evil One, Herle and his troop ride on still, aimlessly and unceasing—unless, indeed, it be true, as Map adds, with compliment to his royal master, that, on the first year of the gracious reign of King Henry II., they were seen to plunge and disappear in the River Wye.

The discussion on the subject of "Free-will and Personality" suggested by Professor Upton in a recent number we are obliged by pressure of other matter still to postpone.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Code Book for Sunday-school Teachers, compiled by W. Copeland Bowie, had its origin in an address given by the author at the Summer Session for S.S. Teachers, held last year at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Bowie spoke on that occasion of the great value of the Code and the instructions to H.M. Inspectors annually issued by the Board of Education, as embodying the fruits of long experience, and containing many excellent suggestions for teachers, and he urged that similar help might be afforded to S.S. teachers. This little book is an attempt, made at the request of the S.S.A. committee, to carry out that idea. It is avowedly tentative, and suggestions are invited for the next edition, which it is contemplated to issue next Whitsuntide. For this reason, if for no other, the book should be in the hands of every superintendent, and of every intelligent teacher throughout the country, that a wide experience of needs and ways of meeting them may be brought to bear on its perfecting; but apart from this ulterior object, there is abundant reason for commending the Code Book to the attention of teachers. The first part consists of a number of helpful notes for the guidance of teachers and superintendents, as to the spirit in which their work should be done, and as to methods, going into many useful details, in the matter of discipline in the class and of the teacher's own temper and disposition, and as to management of the school and its buildings. The second part gives a number of schemes for courses of lessons, the first being of sixty lessons on "Old Testament Heights" taken from a booklet of Mr. Gannett's, and others dealing with New Testament subjects, the elements of religion and literary and historical subjects. (S.S.A., Essex Hall. 6d. net. By post 7d.)

Travel and Life in Palestine, by J. T. Sunderland, M.A., consists of five lectures, prepared on the basis of personal experience in travel as well as of careful reading, as "A Young People's Excursion through the Lands of the Bible." The lectures are prepared in a simple and straightforward style, to be used with the series of lantern slides specially prepared for them; they describe the journey from London to Jerusalem, tell of the past and present of the sacred city, of the neighbourhood, and of the people and their customs; Sinai and Egypt are also touched on, and the last lecture tells of Palestine as seen "from the saddle," the traveller riding north to Samaria, Galilee and Damascus. (S.S.A., Essex Hall. 1s. net).

A List of Lantern Slides offered on Loan by the S.S.A. gives a complete list of the 177 slides for Mr. Sunderland's five lectures above referred to; the slides for two lectures based on Dr. Herford's "Story of Religion in England," and others for simple lectures on "Gems from the Galleries" and "Life and Her Children," &c., with particulars as to terms and conditions for the loan of slides. (S.S.A., Essex Hall. 1d.)

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOSEPH HUDSON, OF BRADFORD.

By the death of Mr. Joseph Hudson, which took place at his residence in Manningham, on Sept. 21, in the eighty-second year of his age, the Chapel-lane congregation has lost one of its oldest and most respected members. He was a native of Sheffield, where he was educated in the tenets of the Established Church, to the ministry of which he once had thoughts of devoting himself. However, in his young days he came under the influence of the Rev. B. T. Stannus, the eloquent minister of the Upper Chapel, and was led to embrace Unitarianism. On settling in Bradford fifty-six years ago, he identified himself with Chapel-lane Chapel during the ministry of the Rev. J. Howard Ryland, whose scholarly discourses attracted him. With slight interruptions, as when he lived in the country, he was from that time till the day of his death, a loyal supporter of the chapel and its institutions. For nearly the same period he was prominently connected with the Bradford Second Equitable Building Society, to which he acted as treasurer for thirty-four years, a position which he retained till within a few weeks of his death. In commercial circles he was much respected for his sound judgment and sterling rectitude. The interment took place at the Undercliffe Cemetery on Sept. 25, when many friends and some of his oldest fellow-worshippers assembled to pay their tribute of love and affection to the memory of the departed. In the course of a short address delivered in the cemetery chapel the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., who officiated, paid a high tribute to the memory of his friend as an upright and conscientious citizen, a devoted member of his church, a man of few words, but of loyal affections, transparently sincere, unassuming, but diligent in well-doing. He did not talk much about his religion, but those who were on terms of intimate friendship with him felt that his feet were on the rock. His creed might be summed up in the words of the Prophet: "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God."

THE GLEBE.

Broken, my God—
Broken as is the clod
Of clay and stubble by the oxen trod,
And by the harrow dragged and rent and torn,
Until the glebe is shorn
Bare and forlorn.

But sown with seed—
Where once the infesting weed
Ruled in the insolence of pride and greed,
The mellowed soul, made pure and strong by pain,
Yields on the sunlit plain
Eternal gain. H. M. L.

Our easy morality does not relax the eternal law of right and wrong; our facile indulgence makes no difference to the natural order of cause and effect by which a man reaps according as he sows.—Charles Harqrove.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Gentleman. To Boys Only.

During the hot days in August the flies and gnats became numerous and annoying. In some places they have been so troublesome and eager to sting that people have cried out that there was an invasion of mosquitoes. And, indeed, they are mosquitoes, only they needed not to invade the country—to come across the sea. They have been here all the while—gnats and mosquitoes are just the same.

If I could show you the fine sharp piercer and the four keen lancets of a gnat you would see how well it is provided to inflict pain upon us. First it plunges in the spear, then it cuts with the lancets, then it pours in the poison which makes the wound itch.

Perhaps you will be thinking that this is a curious thing to talk to you about, but I do so because I want you to find out that the least of the little people in the world have something to teach us. Even the gnats have a message to-day for us British boys and men.

It is this. That the boys and the men among the gnats never sting. They seem never to lose their temper, they are always gentle and harmless. They sing their faint wing-song, but they do not stab and poison our skin. Indeed, that is the law among the little people of the air; the males must be gentle and hurt no one. They must all be gentlemen.

The bees in a hive and the wild bees in their nests in the banks have the same law. So have the wasps. So have even the terrible hornets. The male you may hold in your hand—you may let it crawl over your cheek, it will not harm you.

It would seem sometimes as if among us, the Big People of the Earth, the rule were for the men and boys to be rough and masterful and hot-tempered, and that it is expected of us to show off our strength to the hurt of others. Is that real manliness? No, it is false manliness. True manliness is to have strength, but to use it to save from pain, not to give pain.

Mr. Gladstone once said, "The time to be merciful is when you are strong." Base men boast when they have power, that they can do what they like with other people. I saw a man one day take advantage of a thrush that had got entangled in a net in a garden. Did he go to its rescue and release it? No, he rushed at it with a stick and beat out its frail song-ful life. That was not the mercy of the strong man—that was not obeying the law even of the gentleness of the Little People of the air. But all great and true men are gentle.

Of the brave knights of old it was said that over their hands of iron they wore gloves of velvet—the stronger and braver they were, the more tender their touch and behaviour to the weak and the needy. They were chivalrous—for chivalrous means for a man to be as brave, as strong and as tender as a knight. So, to-day, our thought of a man, or a boy at his best is for him to be healthy and plucky and vigorous but gentle—not brutal—in fact a gentleman.

This is the law of the nobleness of man taught us alike by the gnat and the bee, by the Knight and the King.

LONDON, OCTOBER 12, 1901.

THE MEASURE OF THE STATURE OF THE FULNESS OF CHRIST.

THERE is constant inspiration in the thought that in our Free Churches we are committed to GOD alone, to His worship and the service of His truth. It is not of ourselves, but of His grace. We come together in the presence of the Holiest, that our communion may be with the living GOD, our heavenly FATHER, and that our worship may be in spirit and in truth. In reverence, humility, and trustfulness we ask to be led in His way, and rejoice in His light. Our testimony must be to the strength and gladness of a life surrendered to the FATHER'S will, in the knowledge that His unchanging love is over all.

Thus, in turning once more with new steadfastness of purpose to the service of our churches, the first thought must be of a deeper reverence, a more complete surrender, that there may be in our worship, if it is His will, a larger measure of the spirit in which we are at one with Him, a stronger testimony to His truth, a more perfect love, that shall open to us heavenly secrets and give wisdom and strength to overcome all evil with good. But when we think of that true inward life with GOD and desire that it may be perfected in us and in the fellowship of our churches, we are aware that its growing insight and power have come to us not through any isolated individual experience, but through the unfolding life of our common humanity; and that it is through the knowledge of other lives, stronger and holier and nearer to GOD than ours, and through fellowship with them, that we are roused to loftier aspiration, and, kindled to new faith, gain the strength and insight of a better manhood. And so we are brought to a true understanding of our Christian discipleship.

In speaking last week of the volume of Proceedings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, we pointed to the constant emphasis laid upon the central truth of our spiritual life with GOD, but reserved for the present article a further reference to the place which JESUS holds as the helper of our faith. In this matter we may find in the volume different degrees of insistence, but no difference as to the essential elements of our present life with GOD.

In his presidential address Mr. CARPENTER defined the attitude of the Liberal Faith to the great religious movements of the world. He referred to the growing readiness for union among various Christian churches, but then insisted that beyond even the union of Christendom there was a great spiritual ideal still wider and more comprehensive, which would indeed be found to contain the fundamental conceptions of JESUS, and yet embraced the highest religious life of Non-Christian races, who also had the witness of the Spirit, growing out of a different experience and different historical ideals. Thus the attitude of Christianity towards a devout Indian Theism, or any new development of spiritual religion in Japan, should not be that of the "absolute" religion, claiming to convert, but of one deeply grounded in its own living faith, welcoming and inviting into close sympathy every other in which there were like tokens of reverence and trust, and aspiration after fuller knowledge and more perfect communion with the Eternal. "No nation," said Mr. CARPENTER, "can transfer to another its own past. Contact and sympathy may slowly modify the old instincts, or gradually create new social ideals. But the days of religious conquest by authority have gone by."

The function of Christianity conceived internationally among the races of the world is not to conquer and subdue, but to inspire, to infuse its own ideals and impart some of its own life; and in its turn perhaps to realise with quickening sense of brotherhood the unity of mankind, in that "God hath made of one every nation of men to dwell on all the face of the earth," and so win new confidence in its central truths.

And in another passage, having defined the fundamental truths of a living faith in GOD, as ever present in the great order of Nature and moving as everlasting Righteousness through all the life of Man, he said :—

> The faith which thus reposes on God as the Author and Upholder of the world, the Creator, Sustainer, Guide, Inspirer of man, will draw unfailing guidance from the great historic religions. It will find in them the highest organised expressions, under the forms of race and time and country, of man's enduring relations to the Eternal. It will recognise with undying gratitude its debt to those prophet souls who have flashed light into dark places so that all might see, and given personal shape to the highest spiritual truths. But it will not insist that Christ shall be its centre any more than Plato. Religion can have but one object, the Everlasting God; one centre on which it rests immovable, the Infinite Spirit in which we live and move and have our being.

We confess that, when we first read this passage, we stumbled at the sentence which seemed to imply that in our religious life CHRIST could be of no more significance than PLATO. But that is not what Mr. CARPENTER says, and, after all, it is absolutely true that neither JESUS nor any other can be the centre of our religion, but GOD alone, the One Eternal and Infinite Spirit, whom, with JESUS, we have learnt to trust and love as our FATHER. To those who believe that CHRIST is himself the Eternal GOD such a confession must, of course, be utterly repugnant, but for ourselves the truth appears unquestionable, and to rest on the clearest witness of the religion of JESUS himself. What we owe to that greatest prophet soul of all mankind is given to us from the centre of our rest in GOD, in the stillness of that communion of the hidden life, in which our FATHER makes clear to us the deep things of the spirit.

JESUS helps us as he does to fuller life and profounder faith, because there is in us, in whatever humbler measure, the same spiritual capacity as came in him to such wonderful completeness, and because the Spirit bears witness with our spirit that in him there is the supreme truth of our humanity and he and we alike are indeed children of GOD. And the endeavour of our discipleship must be not in any way to impose the word or the person of JESUS as an external authority over the religion of mankind, but first to realise in ourselves the spirit of his life, to know of a truth the meaning of his life with GOD, and then in the same spirit to make its redeeming power felt in the world. Only so can spiritual truth be vindicated, and a church be truly Christian.

M. FONTANES, in his paper, said that "to neglect the living power and unique attraction of the commanding personality of JESUS of Nazareth would be to incur gratuitously a doom of barren abstraction," for in him we see "the incarnation of the purest and intensest spiritual and moral life." But for that very reason we must insist on his humanity, and make it clear that "JESUS is not the object of Religion, but the subject of that Religion that was dimly emerging out of antiquity, and which eventually came to full bloom in this son of Israel."

And Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE, starting from the fundamental position that "there is a spiritual world, in which GOD and man meet together as Father and child," urged with all his accustomed fervour that "we need, to impassionate us, love for the human leader, as well as love for the Divine Spirit he discloses to us so fully," and that "the heart of man will not endure the forgetfulness of Jesus."

When we see him as he is we shall love him as our Master, love his message and the Father to whom he leads us, and the human race for which he lived and died and rose again.

The clearest guidance in this matter, among all the utterances collected in the International volume, we have found in Dr. Drummond's address on "The Spiritual Factor of Life and Modern Materialism." It is in the hidden life of the soul, Dr. Drummond urges, that we find the surest evidence of the truths of religion, for "spiritual things must be spiritually discerned"; and only as the soul lies open to God can we be led into any fuller knowledge of the truth.

It is the Divinity within us that draws us to Christ; and unless we believe in God, and believe in Him spiritually, as One in whom we live and move, who speaks to our hearts and answers our prayers, we could not believe in Christ. And, nevertheless, it is true that, when we believe in him, a flood of light is shed upon many a dim experience from the richness and fulness of that gracious life, and his advent marked a creative epoch in the religion of the world. He was no mere reformer, calling men back to the purity of ancient days, but fused together into a new and living organism the scattered elements of faith; and called on men to rise into that Divine sonship which alone could realise the formative thought of God, and give a final answer to the secret aspirations of the human heart. And so it is through fellowship with himself, through the infusion of the same spirit, through our entrance into the same deep, interior life, that he in his turn brings us to the Father who has led us to him, and thereby completely interprets the long Divine process which has been educating mankind, and gives us at last perfect rest and peace in the submission of our wills to the Will of God, not through the reluctant obedience of duty, but through the holy self-sacrifice and communion of love.

There is, therefore, this added appeal, which comes to us in the quiet hours of the worship of our churches, and in the prayer which must find its completest utterance in the spirit and the faithful service of our daily lives. As we seek for truer communion with God, our Father, and clearer vision of His truth, we lift up our eyes of necessity to what is noblest and most divine in our own humanity; and this leads us in grateful discipleship to Jesus, entering into the profound simplicity of his religion, and realising the measure of the stature of his manhood. We may not make of him a dogma, or a barrier to the widest spiritual fellowship, but we must bear witness to what we have found to be the divinest truth and the most potent and helpful companionship of our life.

FOR THE MAGNANIMITY OF ENGLAND.

Sir,—It may seem to you a vain thing to pray or to plead for peace any more. To hope for aught but the long slow agony of strife, continued till the slayer can no longer slay, is, perhaps, a kind of impotent piteousness such as the wise man will scorn. Yet, useless though it be, could you admit to your columns some few words which, from one who has been musing on the possible magnanimity of a great nation, plead for expression somewhere?

Difficult as it may be to many, yet let us suppose that England has been in the right all through and her stubborn foes entirely in the wrong. Now that she has broken their power, is it not a time when she might nobly prove that she is merciful as well as strong? Could she not now, consistently with her dignity and greatness, offer terms of generous and honourable peace? She has proved to those little Republics that they cannot withstand her might. Their power to permanently injure British interests by force of arms is, once and for ever, overthrown. Is it not enough? Must it seem a strange thing to hope, or at least greatly to desire, that England should now arise in her strength and nobleness to offer to these conquered ones the grace of her large charity, the kindness of her "uncovenanted mercies"? For this would be only to introduce into our national politics an element of that religion called "Christian" which, now for a long time, we have professed. It cannot be altogether ridiculous to expect of a people, whose Legislative Assembly daily opens its proceedings with prayers in the name of Christ, that it should now prove to a beaten foe and to all the world, that it forgets not, in the day of victory, that he taught such doctrines as the forgiveness of injuries, and even love to one's enemies. Granted—if no less than this will satisfy our sense of injured innocence—that the fault and the folly which led to this awful strife lay entirely with the Boers, have we no greatness of soul as a nation whereby, with the calm dignity of conquerors, to hold out to the conquered offers of friendly reconciliation such as they could accept without ignoble and humiliating submission?

It is said that they will accept nothing short of "full independence." Are we so sure of that? They have been told, by the highest authority, that "no shred of independence" shall ever be theirs again. Has that assertion ever been withdrawn, or explained to them as not meaning, literally, what it must seem to mean to them? And is it not this that is driving them to fight, as most Englishmen would fight, to the death, rather than submit to what, in their eyes, must mean abject and servile surrender? Surely England would be choosing the nobler part if now she frankly withdrew those stern words, and held out the hand of friendship, and offered terms which a brave, however misguided, foe might accept—or show himself hopelessly irreconcilable. Would not this better become a great people in the hour of victory, than forcing the few remaining survivors in the field to fight and die rather than come bending at the conqueror's feet in unconditional surrender, harbouring still undying hate within their hearts? There must be more strength of mercy than of revenge in the conscience of England, could it only find a voice. And if we may not appeal to the spirit of him whose name her professed religion bears, we might at least remember the example of the great and wise ruler of England—the Alfred of a thousand years ago—who conquered his enemies (invaders of his territory, too), first by the sword, and then by the generosity of his terms of peace.

Surely there has been enough of slaughter and of death, of misery and woe to men, women and children, in that sorrowful land! Surely the day has come when the victors need no longer wish to bring the conquered cringing to their feet, but should try to understand them, and should offer them, in magnanimity of wisdom, more than they will ever have power to demand, and so make them friends for ever, and bind the two great races which have colonised South Africa in the bonds of enduring fellowship and unassailable peace! W. J. Jupp.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

On Tuesday, Oct. 1, a meeting was held in Birmingham in one of the committee rooms of the Council House, by the kind permission of the Lord Mayor, in aid of this fund. Among the ladies and gentlemen present were Mr. and Miss Nettlefold, Miss E. Harrold, Rev. H. Enfield and Mrs. Dowson, Mr. and Mrs. E. L. Tyndall, Mr. E. H. Lee, Mr. H. New, Mr. H. Payton, the Rev. E. D. P. Evans, the Rev. A. H. Shelley, and other friends. The chair was taken by Mr. J. Archibald Kenrick, treasurer of the Midland Christian Union, who called on the Rev. J. E. Carpenter to explain the objects and methods of the fund.

Mr. Carpenter, after expressing regret at the unavoidable absence of Mr. David Martineau and of Mr. T. H. Russell (secretary of the Ministers' Benevolent Society), traced the steps by which the scheme had assumed its present shape, and pointed out that the committee appointed at Sheffield in 1897 had carefully considered the existing funds and had come to the conclusion that still further effort was needed in aid of the ministers. He had been asked last week whether in view of incomes rising to £1,200 a year such provision as was now contemplated was really required. There might be such incomes in the United States; he had never heard of them here. Even there, however, they were exceptional, and he believed that their American friends were preparing for the establishment of a new fund on lines very similar to those which he was then advocating. In this country there could be no doubt about the need. Mr. Rawson had shown at the first Conference at Liverpool nineteen years ago that on a comparison of more than 250 incomes 45 were under £100, 56 under £150; and the average of the whole (including 13 at £500 and upwards) worked out just under £200 per annum. The position to-day was still more serious if the view of the same authority was correct. Mr. Rawson had had unrivalled experience as an administrator both of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund and the Sustentation Fund, and he had expressed the deliberate opinion that since 1882 there had been "an appreciable reduction all round." This opinion the speaker had heard before from another high authority, but he had shrunk from accepting it. They saw signs of activity and wealth in their large towns, they went to stately churches and beautiful services, and well equipped missions; they knew with what generosity efforts such as had created Manchester College at Oxford and Willaston School had been supported. But it must be remembered that the census returns showed how the movement of population had left many of the small towns and the country congregations comparatively destitute, so that their position was often very precarious, and he feared that Mr. Rawson's conclusion must be accepted. He believed, therefore, that there was a call for further aid, and he came fearlessly to the home of the great fund which had been so wisely administered by the directors of the Ministers' Benevolent Society. Among the representatives of the other funds they had some of their warmest supporters. Many of the donors to the new fund had expressed an anxious and almost affectionate interest in the welfare of ministers, which convinced him that his brethren had never stood higher in the esteem and respect of the laity than they did to-day. He felt confident that by a united effort the whole sum that was required could be raised, and he asked the aid of his brethren in active service in placing the cause before their churches.

Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, Treasurer to the Fund, said that the result of the effort made between Whitsuntide and the holidays was most satisfactory. Towards the capital sum of £18,000 needed to obtain the two final donations of £1,000 from Mr. Colfox and Mr. Nettlefold over £12,000 had been promised, mostly in answer to private application. Subscriptions had also been given to the amount of nearly £200 towards the £300 for which the Committee asked. They were now beginning a more public appeal to all the churches, and the generosity with which they had been met so far was the best assurance that their appeal would not be in vain. He had been told when he started in life that a professional man should put by half his income, but for ministers with under £200 a year such counsels were impossible.

The Chairman, in moving a resolution commending the fund to the churches of the Midland Christian Union, said that some might have wished for some further measures for increasing the incomes of mininters; but he felt that security for old age was of the utmost importance, and he should give the scheme his heartiest support.

The Rev. J. Wood, in seconding the resolution, dwelt on the importance to the churches of an adequate supply of effectively-trained ministers. The ministry often failed to offer men a reasonable living. There was the difficulty of making provision for old age, especially if a man had followed that early but not obsolete Scripture, "It is not good for man to be alone." It was said that it was good for ministers to feel the pinch of poverty; the saying might be equally good for laymen. He dwelt on the need for some security in old age, and believed that the fund would grow. Its success, he felt, was assured, as it was based on the principle of helping those who were willing to help themselves.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson said that it was thirty-four years since his ministry in Birmingham had ceased, but he never came with more pleasure among his old friends than he did that day to express his sympathy with his brother ministers. He knew how much of the success of his own work had been due to the freedom from strain which he owed ultimately to Birmingham. He recalled the work done by the Ministers' Benevolent Society, which had gone through the length and breadth of the land, and on which time and thought and labour had been spent so richly. In the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund and in the Sustentation Fund they all knew what the laity had been doing for them; but there was room for something more. He was entirely in accord with Mr. Wood about the new element of insurance now introduced. No men suffered more in their working powers from anxiety than ministers. In mental depression they could not bend their intellectual and spiritual energies to the production of sermons. Many ministers had to struggle with the anxiety of not knowing what would be the future of their families. He made his plea earnestly to the laity, who had shown time after time that they would support with the utmost generosity the causes that commended themselves to their hearts and convictions.

The Rev. J. C. Street most cordially supported the resolution. Ministers had often a heavy drain on their scanty resources arising out of their work, and anxiety for those dependent on them pressed very heavily. Many ministers had a hungry desire for their children to be well taught. He could tell stories of ministers who, after preaching on Sundays, wrought with their hands during the week in order to secure their children's education. He believed that their Church, so far as ministers were concerned, was almost the poorest in Christendom.

The Rev. L. P. Jacks supported the resolution with full conviction, and with additional pleasure, as he happened to be the President of the Ministers' Benevolent Society for the time being. The fund was called for through the necessities of their ministers. The average of £200 a year gave no idea of the poverty to which they were exposed. He supported the fund further because the ground was not sufficiently covered by the Widows' Fund in Lancashire and Cheshire, or the Ministers' Benevolent Society. The demands for ministers in their old age were greater than could be met by existing resources.

The resolution having been carried unanimously, Mr. A. W. Worthington moved, and Rev. A. A. Charlesworth seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor for his kindness in granting the use of the room; and, after Mr. Carpenter had moved a similar vote to the Chairman, the meeting ended.

To some most true and faithful lives this divine word never comes with any rapture and ecstasy at all, but only like "daily bread"—a simple, quiet faith, arming the soul for duty, and keeping it unshaken before all danger.—Merriam.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING AND CONFERENCE.

The annual meeting of this Association was held on Wednesday, Oct. 2, in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Representatives were present from Stockton, Middlesbrough, Barnard Castle, Darlington, Sunderland, South Shields, Choppington, Ashington, Gateshead, Byker, Carlisle, and Newcastle-on-Tyne. There were also present Mr. W. Blake Odgers, M.A., LL.D., K.C., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mrs. Blake Odgers, Rev. Jas. Forrest, M.A., Glasgow, representing the Scottish Unitarian Association, Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., York, representing the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, Rev. Frank Walters, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Rev. W. H. Lambelle, Middlesbrough, Rev. Charles Travers, Carlisle, Rev. Arthur Harvie, Gateshead, Rev. Francis Wood, Sunderland, Messrs. Thomas Paxton, South Shields, Walter Glover, Choppington, and John Glendinning, Byker, &c. The chair was taken at 11.30 by Mrs. John Tweedy, in the absence through indisposition of the President, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., and the proceedings opened with the hymn "O worship the King," followed by prayer, offered by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle.

Mrs. Tweedy expressed the great regret that they must all feel at the absence of their President and its unfortunate cause. In the name of the Newcastle members she heartily welcomed the delegates from a distance, remarking that although they were a scattered community and were divided by space, yet they were all united at heart, working in the same cause of justice, freedom, and truth. Mrs. Tweedy also alluded to the regretted absence from their gathering of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, who owing to his continued ill-health since his return to England from India, had been ordered by the doctors to give up all public engagements during the year. Proceeding to speak of the work of the Association, Mrs. Tweedy observed that though their organisation had accomplished much good, she considered it had not accomplished as much as it should, considering the requirements of the district. She urged greater individual enthusiasm.

The corresponding secretary, Mr. Fred. C. Slater, read the Committee's report. The financial statement was read by Mr. J. Duncan Donald, in the absence of the treasurer, Mr. John Pattison, J.P.

Mrs. Tweedy moved the adoption of both reports, which was seconded by Mr. George Gruit, and agreed to.

The report stated that an adverse balance of £57 6s. 7d. had been cleared off by the efforts of the President, and that the work of the Association had been concentrated on the strengthening of existing churches; but the hope was expressed that before long further missionary work might be undertaken. The retirement of the Treasurer, Mr. John Pattison, through pressure of other business, was noted with much regret, and interesting particulars were given as to the work of the churches of the district. The successful pilgrimage to Catterick on July 13, organised by the Teeside Committee, and fully reported at the time in these columns, was also recorded.

Councillor Robert Elliott, of Gates-head, moved the election of president, officers, and committee, and further moved a cordial vote of thanks to the officers and committee for their services during the past year.

Mrs. George Cooper seconded.

The resolutions were accepted with acclamation.

Short addresses relating to the condition of the various churches under their charge were given by the Revs. W. H. Lambelle, C. Travers, A. Harvie, F. Wood, and Messrs. T. Paxton, W. Glover, and J. Glendinning.

The meeting then adjourned for luncheon in the schoolroom, provided by the President, and afterwards reassembled in the church, when Dr. W. Blake Odgers delivered an address dealing with the condition of the churches and the work of the Association.

This closed the formal business of the meeting, which was followed immediately by the Conference, over which Mr. E. Cox-Walker, of Darlington, presided.

The Rev. Frank Walters read the paper entitled "Twentieth-Century Unitarianism," which we published in full last week. An interesting discussion followed, and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Walters.

The annual tea was held in the schoolrooms adjoining at 5.30, the ladies of the Dorcas Benevolent Society again at their own cost providing the tea, to which an excellent company sat down.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the church, the chair being taken at 7 o'clock by the Rev. Frank Walters, who was supported by Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Revs. Jas. Forrest, Hy. Rawlings, and the Secretaries, Messrs. Fred. C. Slater and Edw. H. Coysh.

After an opening hymn, the Chairman said:—

"Much as I regret the accident which prevents our President from being with us this evening, I feel honoured to preside over such a large and interesting gathering. At a very short notice I have been asked to undertake a duty which is all the more congenial because the church of which I am minister has always been in the forefront of our mission work, and I myself take the deepest interest in the propagation of our Unitarian Faith. It has been an intense pleasure to me to-day to mark the bright, cheery, optimistic spirit which has characterised our meetings, both in the morning and afternoon, and to listen to the hopeful words spoken by our ministers and lay-preachers. There has been no grumbling, complaining, or despondency. We all feel that the time for criticism is past, and the time for strenuous work is come. Here in this Newcastle district we have a minister settled at every church, and our staff of ministers and lay-preachers form a brave little army ready to fight shoulder to shoulder for the sake of the good cause. And here, also, I am certain are generous friends ready to supply us with the sinews of war. Very often we shrink from some serious enterprise because of the financial cost; but we always find that as soon as we can show that good work is needed to be done, the money is invariably forthcoming to carry it through. We have got the workers, we are sure of the funds, and now nothing remains but to start preaching, lecturing, and spreading our literature with all the zeal that we can command. For myself I confess I am entering on this coming winter's campaign with greater courage and confidence than ever. Two appeals that I have ventured to make to our committee and to our lay-preachers' conference have met with splendid responses; and already we have arranged for courses of theological lectures in each of our churches, and also for a series of week-night services in the east end of the city. I feel that I am being backed by faithful and resolute friends in any work I may suggest; and I am anticipating a season of earnest work with the utmost hope and confidence. And this splendid gathering this evening is the earnest of the success which I am certain will crown our efforts."

A resolution of welcome was extended to Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Mrs. Odgers, and the Revs. James Forrest and Henry Rawlings, on the motion of Mrs. Tweedy and Mr. E. Cox-Walker.

Dr. Odgers, in responding, said the present meeting was the fifty-sixth held under the auspices of that Association. What, he asked, was a Unitarian Christian? He himself was a Unitarian because he believed that God is One; he was a Christian because he looked to Jesus Christ as his teacher, his guide, and his example. Why were not all the world Unitarians? How did they differ from their brethren of other Churches? Because they did not believe that God was one quite in the same way as we do; and they did not look upon Jesus Christ quite in the same way as we do. They regarded Jesus Christ as their guide, teacher, and example; but they said that while he was on earth apparently a man, he was in some mysterious way also the great God who had created heaven and earth—the God whom they worshipped. The orthodox doctrine of the atonement that God, the very examplar of love and mercy, should have inflicted upon His innocent son sufferings for a sin committed 4,000 years before was, the speaker urged, absolutely wicked, degrading, and blasphemous. Such a conception is worse than ridiculous. It gives one an utterly wrong idea of God, representing Him as an angry tyrant who will not be satisfied unless His justice has its full measure of vengeance worked out for it. Those ideas were bad, because they perverted the notions of right and wrong, and those views were to be combated and contradicted wherever they met them. What was wanted by so many of their fellowmen was a simple and intelligent form of Christianity, and this Unitarians professed to offer. Unitarians, too, had put into practical application the doctrines they professed. In the early part of the last century, for instance, Unitarians were found to be taking part in every struggle for social amelioration. He believed that the human race was steadily progressing. This doctrine ought to be taught in the coming century, and Unitarians were best qualified to teach it. In conclusion, Dr. Odgers urged continued and increased activity in the propagation of our faith.

Interesting addresses were also given by the Revs. James Forrest and Henry Rawlings, who conveyed the greetings of their respective associations.

After the usual votes of thanks, Bishop Heber's hymn "Holy, Holy, Holy! Lord God Almighty!" was sung with great heartiness, Mr. Walters pronouncing the benediction, thus closing a most successful series of meetings.

MOSS SIDE UNITARIAN FREE CHURCH.

OPENING OF THE NEW CHURCH.

In our last week's issue we printed a drawing of the new church at Moss Side, with the school adjoining, and added details as to the history and development of our cause there. The church is a handsome and commodious structure, with sitting accommodation comfortably for just over 500 persons. A very fine arch divides the chancel from the church. On one side of the chancel is the organ-chamber, and on the other side choir, minister's, and wardens' vestries. There are three beautiful memorial windows; that in the chancel, representing the Good Samaritan, having been placed by the congregation to the memory of William Roberts, who so munificently contributed towards the cost of the church; a side window has been placed by Colonel Pilcher to the memory of his brother, Albert Pilcher, who faithfully and devotedly served the church before his death, as Chairman of Committee; and another side window opposite has been placed by Mrs. Roper to the memory of her mother, Sarah Standring. The Communion-table cloth is a lovely work of art, presented by Mrs. Archibald Briggs and her daughter, Miss Briggs, the latter having wrought it with her own hands. The chancel chairs, and the pictures in the minister's vestry, are the gift of Mrs. John Livesley.

The Dedication Service, last Saturday afternoon, was conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper, and the sermon preached by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. A congregation of at least 650 persons crowded the church. Mr. Carpenter based his discourse on Philippians iii. 13 and 14 and Hebrews xii. 22, in the course of which he said:—

In courage and trust, born of thankfulness and humility, you have reared your new church. By the act of dedicating this building of yours to the worship of God, you enter now into your well-earned priveleges. You set before yourselves great tasks, and you assume great responsibilities. For the path of religion is not an easy excursion, or a light-hearted jaunt. To follow it seriously calls for unceasing labour and self-sacrifice. It promises us, indeed, through them a continuous joy, but it demands something of an heroic temper, and only through toil and prayer do we reach the final peace. This has been in truth, in all ages, the secret of its success. It has called men seriously to great tasks.

There are times when we long to lay down our arms to halt upon the march, and simply rest upon the way; there are times when the contradictions of life are too baffling, when the energy of endeavour is spent, and the burden and the mystery seem heavier than we can bear. These hours would be too hard for us were there no sanctuary for us to take our hope and prayer to. There, in that sanctuary, we rise above our troubles, and return to the scene of human duties, and human needs, strengthened. Religion is not content until she has found a way through the everlasting thought and life, and knelt at the shrine of enduring right.

Not as a single event, but as a continuous process, the Church must bear unceasing witness to the love of God. It must for ever declare the upward calling and show that we are members of the city of the living God. Only in true worship can we know that we are working out our own salvation; it is God who is working in us both to will and to do His good pleasure. Look around the streets and cities, and from them up to Mount Sion. There is the fair ideal. The Church cannot stand aloof at a cold distance. It can and must prepare the hearts of men for the needful sacrifice. It can lift them above suspicion and fear when the task is too hard for them. It can convince them that what the Father calls upon us to do, He will not leave us without the power to do. It can keep before men God's great summons to take part with Him in the world's strife. It can show the power of modest effort. It can reveal the ideal life of each eternal soul, and the strength of the cup of cold water given for the immediate need. It can carry all service into the temple of the spirit and lay it on the altar as an offering of love.

At the conclusion of the service the choir sang the "Hallelujah Chorus." The offertory on behalf of the Furnishing and Church Funds amounted altogether to nearly £180. A great many things are still needed in the church, the most important of which is an organ, the one now in use being a small hired one. The building, however, as far as it goes, is opened free of debt; and it is the fixed determination of the congregation to buy nothing until it can be paid for. Even now some £800 more is required for the church's complete equipment.

THE EVENING MEETING.

Tea was provided in the adjoining school, and 500 persons stayed to partake of it. In the evening a meeting was held in the church, presided over by Mr. John Tyson. After the singing of a hymn the Chairman delivered an address, in which he briefly sketched the history of the movement from the time when two or three talked over the scheme until that day. He referred to the vastly populated district in which the church was situated, and to the work which was waiting to be done.

A letter of congratulation from Dr. Brooke Herford was read, in which the writer said:—

> I used to dream of a movement at Moss Side thirty years ago. You have realised the dream in a success I never ventured to look forward to. I cannot tell you what an encouragement it is to me, now that I have had to draw out of the work, to see the zeal and efficiency and "patient continuance in well-doing" of the younger men who have risen up and are carrying it forward.

Mr. H. M. Whitefield, on behalf of the congregation, thanked the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter for his impressive sermon, and for his kindness in coming amongst them. He also laid emphasis upon the work which the church had to do, and the great population which surrounds it. They did not want to unsettle people who were quite satisfied with membership in orthodox churches; but they did want to attract those who were homeless, who had outgrown the old creeds, and yet had not discovered the freedom and the truth for which Unitarianism stands.

The Rev. J. E. Carpenter briefly replied, saying what pleasure it had given him to have the privilege of speaking to such a large congregation of earnest workers.

Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., President of the B. and F.U.A., was the next speaker. He said he was very glad indeed that he had been there that day. He thoroughly enjoyed the opening service in that beautiful church with its beautiful windows. The service had been a thing to be remembered. That church stood for two great doctrines—the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. It was dedicated to the fearless and unfettered search after God's truth. No creed had been laid down. The trust deed simply says that the church is to be used for the worship of Almighty God; and it almost goes out of its way further to assert that no creed shall be imposed either upon minister, officer, or people. Dr. Odgers briefly traced our heritage of freedom from Puritan forefathers, and then went on to show how different things were in the Established Church. At the recent Church Congress a speaker had said "there might be expansion, amplification, unforeseen applications of old truths; but there could be no new doctrines in pure theology. A new doctrine was necessarily a false doctrine." Unitarians do not say that because a doctrine is new it must be false; but they believe that God has given men brains in order that they may search for higher truth. That new church would be dedicated to the widening knowledge of God's truth; that pulpit would be used for telling man his duty to man as well as to God, and the fact of the great common brotherhood.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, whom the Chairman designated the "Unitarian Bishop of the Manchester Diocese," offering congratulations both on his own behalf and on behalf of the Manchester District Association which he was appointed to represent, confessed that fifteen years ago, when the starting of that movement was discussed, he was one of those who did not think it could succeed; but he long ago saw how mistaken was his prophecy, and no one rejoiced more than he did to see what a strong and vigorous church had been built up. He was also proud to think that some of the backbone of that church came from Lower Mosley-street Sunday-school.

Mr. William Long, J.P., of Warrington, also said a few words of hearty congratulation. He had all along taken a deep interest both in the church and its minister, and it gave him unbounded satisfaction to see that day the grand result which had been achieved.

Colonel Pilcher, as a neighbour and friend, said that many years before this movement was started he urged his brother, the late Rev. Richard Pilcher, not to think of taking up a pastorate away from Manchester, but to stay at home with him and undertake with his lay help the establishment of a new church at Moss Side. He saw how the district was growing, and felt sure there was an opportunity for successful Unitarian propaganda.

The Rev. Charles Roper related the story as to how the money was raised for the church practically within the congregation itself; and Mr. John Lawson and Mr. William Dawson moved and seconded respectively a vote of thanks to the friends who had kindly come to address them that evening.

Dr. Blake Odgers briefly responded.

A concluding hymn was sung, and the pastor pronounced the benediction.

On Sunday the special preacher was the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A. Notwithstanding a deluge of rain almost up to the hour of service, there was a large morning congregation; but in the evening 550 persons were present, and listened with wrapt attention to an eloquent exposition of Unitarian principles. To-morrow (Sunday) the Rev. John Page Hopps will be the preacher.

AN IMPOSTOR.

Sir,—It has come to my knowledge from several sources that a young man, who gives the name of Moore, is calling upon subscribers to the London Domestic Mission, and representing that I have sent him, is asking for money. He usually pretends in the first instance that he is an invalid and applies for a hospital letter. Will you permit me to state that the man in question is a thorough impostor! He called upon me once and gave references to persons who knew nothing whatever of him, and manufactured an unknown address for himself. And I should like to add, seeing that people have been deceived through this representation, that I should never think of sending anyone to any of the subscribers to the Mission, in the way this man purports to come.

G. Dawes Hicks,
Hon. Sec. to London Domestic Mission Society.

The nineteenth biennial National Conference of the Unitarian Churches of America was held at Saratoga, opening on Monday, Sept. 23 and closing on the following Thursday evening. We shall look with the greatest interest to coming numbers of the Register for a full account of the meetings, which from the programme must have been very rich in interest, and, we doubt not, full of vigorous faith and courage.

The congregation of Bank-street Chapel, Bury, have issued a handbook of their bazaar, to be held from Wednesday to Saturday, Oct. 16 to 19, which opens with a most interesting historical record, illustrated by portraits of ministers and pictures of past and present buildings. There are also portraits of those who are to open the bazaar on successive days. We will not betray any more secrets, and only say to all who are within reach—Go and see, and, of course, buy!

Mr. Vithal Ranji Shinde, B.A., of Poonah, a graduate of Bombay University, who has come to this country to study at Manchester College, Oxford, with the B. and F. U. A. Brahmo Somaj Scholarship, reached London after a very pleasant voyage, in time to be present at the meetings of the Provincial Assembly at Essex Church on Tuesday. At the morning service in the church, Mr. Shinde felt at once the close kinship of the religious life of English Unitarians with that of the Brahmo Somaj. The college session opens at Oxford on Monday, when Mr. Shinde is assured of a welcome no less cordial than that which he has already received in London.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Harvest Services.

Among last Sunday's harvest thanksgiving services were the following:—Allostock.—Special afternoon service, conducted by the Rev. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford. Collections £2 3s. At the Knutsford services on the previous Sunday the Rev. J. C. Odgers, of Bury, was the preacher, and the collections, with donations, amounted to £8 14s. 6d. Brighton, with special anthems, and sermons by the Rev. H. M. Livens. Deal.—Preacher in the morning, the Rev. T. Shakespeare: in the evening, the Rev. S. Burrows, of Dover. Devonport.—Preacher, the Rev. E. B. Russell. Flowery Field, Hyde.—Preacher, the Rev. R. Balmforth, of Cape Town. London: Peckham.—Services largely musical. Addresses by the Rev. G. Carter morning and evening, and in the afternoon to the Sunday-school. Plumstead.—Preacher, the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones. Children's address in the afternoon by Mr. Lowe. Followed on Monday by a congregational social. South Shields (Sept. 29.—Preacher, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, followed by a fruit banquet on Monday, when a presentation of a silver teapot was made to Mrs. Walker (née Armitage), on the occasion of her marriage, and in recognition of her services to church and school. Wick and Nottage (on Monday and Tuesday).—Preachers at Wick, the Revs. T. J. Jenkins and W. J. Phillips; at Nottage, the Rev. D. Evans, Congregational minister, gave a striking address.

Ainsworth.—On Wednesday evening, Oct. 2, the Unitarian Literary Society held the first meeting of the coming session, when a public lecture was given by Dr. Nuttall, of Little Lever, on "Cottage Houses, from a Sanitary Point of View." The Rev. M. R. Scott presided, and there was a large attendance, a warm vote of thanks being accorded to the lecturer.

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—The school sermons, usually held here in July, but postponed this year on account of the new organ opening in that month, when £125 were realised by the collections, were blended on Sunday last with the Harvest Festival services. Miss Marian Pritchard, of London, addressed the scholars and teachers, especially at the morning service; and the Rev. John Page Hopps preached afternoon and evening. The weather was exceedingly unfavourable, but nearly 700 assembled in the evening, even as they had gathered proportionately well in the morning and afternoon. The collections for the school amounted to £60.

Bridgwater.—The annual Sunday-school treat took place at Sunny Bank, the residence of the Misses Spiller, on Thursday afternoon, Oct 3. After tea the children were joined by the teachers and a number of the congregation, upwards of eighty partaking of Miss Spiller's hospitality.

Chorley.—The venerable chapel, the home of the oldest Nonconformist congregation in Chorley, was closed last Sunday for renovation, and the Rev. Andrew Doel preached a commemorative sermon. The present chapel, which was built in 1725, by Mr. Abraham Crampton, a banker of Derby, succeeded a little meeting-house, the home of a few earnest, godly Puritans, who were gathered by the Rev. Mr. Welch, one of the ejected ministers by the Act of Uniformity, 1662. Its history of development from the old Presbyterian days is similar to that of other of our chapels. Among its ministers was the father of the late Sir Henry Tate, Bart. A sum of £750 has been raised towards the renovation of this place of worship, but £200 more will be needed before the work is finished.

Horsham.—On Wednesday afternoon the remains of Mrs. Humphrey Nash were laid to rest in the chapel graveyard. The deceased lady had a life-long connection with the congregation, being a daughter of the Rev. Robert Ashdowne, who occupied the pulpit from 1831 to 1860. Her husband has for many years acted as honorary treasurer of the church. Although very troubled to walk of late years, she was a constant attendant at the Sunday services, and there were few week evening meetings for adults at which her face was missing. Ever ready with a word of appreciation for the efforts of other workers, and touchingly grateful for any little personal service that might be rendered to herself, her loss will be felt by both minister and people with whom she worshipped.

Liverpool.—A meeting was held on Thursday evening, Oct. 3, in the new meeting-room of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, for the purpose of organising a new temperance association in connection with the Unitarian Churches of Liverpool and district. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who presided, spoke of the failure of legislation up to the present time to deal adequately with the drink question, and he urged the duty of individual total abstinence in order to save people from the drinking habit. He said that the time had come for Unitarians to have their own separate organisation. After considerable discussion, the name "The Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society" was decided upon, and a council was chosen, including representatives of Ullet-road, Bootle, and Hope-street Churches, the Ancient Chapel, and the Missions of Mill-street, Hamilton-road, the North-end, and Garston, under the presidency of the Rev. W. J. Jupp. An annual subscription of one penny constitutes membership, and it is hoped that all Churches and Missions of Liverpool and district will organise Bands of Hope or Temperance Societies, each of which is entitled to send representatives to the council. Mrs. Ellams, of Ullet-road Church, was appointed hon. treasurer, and Miss E. K. McConnell, of Hope-street Church, hon. secretary. After the business part of the meeting, Mr. Fred Robinson read a paper on "Temperance Work," in which he spoke of the necessity of providing counter attractions to the public-house.

London: Essex Church.—A well-attended meeting was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday evening to inaugurate a Guild in connection with the National Conference Guilds Union. The chair was taken by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, who explained the chief aims and objects which a guild might accomplish. The Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the Guilds' Union, gave an earnest address to the meeting, and described the various branches of operation in his own Guild at Birmingham. Letters of congratulation and greeting were read from the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., vice-president, and the Rev. John Ellis, secretary, wishing success to the new society. The resolution constituting the Guild was moved by Miss A. Lawrence and seconded by Mrs. W. W. Bruce, who read an interesting letter from Miss Edith Gittens, of Leicester. Miss E. M. Lawrence and Mr. Bryan Johnson also addressed the meeting, at the close of which thirty-one names of members were given in.

London: Stepney.—The third monthly Conference on Ideals of Christianity was held at College Chapel last Sunday afternoon. An address on "Mazzini" was given by Mr. C. E. Maurice, who said that Mazzini fulfilled the function of the truly great man, to be in the world and not of it, and though he always took an active part in the world's affairs he was sustained and guided by unworldly ideals. He was trained at an early age in the worship of equality by his democratic parents. He was stirred while a boy by contact with the Piedmontese refugees. He grew up with the sentiment of liberty and equality surrounding him like an atmosphere, and he consecrated his life to the realisation of his ideal. He had much to do in correcting dangerous fallacies arising from the liberal teaching of the day, the writings of Voltaire and Rousseau, and the influence of the French Revolution. The Society of Young Italy, which he founded, aimed at the welding of the various States into one whole, under a Republican form of Government. Its formula was "God and the People." For the idea of mere revolt against authority he substituted the sense of duty—duty to the country, to the family, to the highest law. "All sovereignty is in God, in the moral law, in the Providential Design, which rules the world, and is from time to time revealed to humanity by virtuous genius, in the aim we have to reach, in the mission we have to fulfil." Mazzini guarded against extremists and anarchy by insisting on association as the great principle of our time. In contradistinction to the methods of the Carbonari, the Society of Young Italy was to be free, definite, and open in its propaganda, and intended to knit together all classes in the common movement for the liberation of the country. Though he did not call himself a Christian, yet his ideals were Christ-like. He wrote: "The law of God has not two weights and two measures; Christ came for all; he spoke to all: he died for all. We cannot logically declare the children of God to be equal before God and unequal before men. . . . We cannot wish the brow that is raised to heaven to fall prostrate in the dust before any created being. . . . We protest, then, against all inequality, against all oppression wheresoever it is practised." He regarded the democratic movement as an attempt at the practical realisation of the only prayer taught us by Christ: Thy kingdom come, they will be done on earth as it is in heaven. The Chairman (Mr. P. W. Ames), Miss Florence Hill, Mr. Chambers, and others joined in the discussion, Loughborough (Appointment).—The Rev. Peter Dean, for twenty-six years minister at Walsall, has accepted an invitation to the ministry of Victoria-street Church, and entered on his duties last Sunday.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The anniversary sermons were preached in the Church of the Divine Unity last Sunday, by the Rev. James Forrest, M.A., of Glasgow. In the morning, preaching from Phil. iii. 13 and 14, he said that Unitarians were believers in progress, because they were believers in a living God, indwelling in the world and mankind. That faith was of the very essence of their Unitarianism. Too much stress might be laid on their denial of the deity of Jesus, but it involved a very positive belief in the divinity of man, and on that positive belief all their rational views of religion rested. It supplied them with an ideal of insistent authority. In the evening the subject of Mr. Forrest's sermon was "Unitarians of the United World."

Preston.—On Sunday the members of the Percy-street congregation welcomed the Rev. N. Anderton back from his holiday and honeymoon, and on Monday evening, at a meeting of Sunday-school teachers, a more formal welcome was extended to Mr. and Mrs. Anderton. The Band of Hope reopened on Tuesday, when a special entertainment was given by the Misses Mayor and Mrs. McKeague. The attendance was good in spite of a very wet night, and a most enjoyable evening was spent. The Society was started last year as a branch of the Sunday-school work, and the results have been in every way satisfactory.

South Wales Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meetings were held at Cwmbach, Aberdare, on Wednesday and Thursday week, and were an occasion of genuine refreshing to the members present. On Wednesday there were (Welsh fashion) two sermons in the evening, and on Thursday one in the morning, one in the afternoon (in English), and two in the evening. The attendance continued to increase throughout. The next meetings are to be held at Easter at Capelgroes, to celebrate the centenary of the foundation of the congregation by Dr. Charles Lloyd in 1802.

Torquay.—The winter session of fortnightly meetings at Unity Hall commenced on Monday, Oct. 7, with a free concert, which was well attended. The programme, which was of a high class, included Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, beautifully played by Mrs. G. H. Handford, accompanied by an excellent orchestra of strings, drums, and organ. On Monday, Oct. 21, Dr. Karkeek has promised a lecture on "The Manners and Customs of the Fourteenth Century."

Walsall.—The Rev. Peter Dean concluded his twenty-six years' ministry at Walsall on Sunday week, and at the close of the Sunday night service it was announced that he was leaving the congregation entirely free from debt. On Monday night, the 30th ult., a town's presentation was made to him at the Temperance Hall, Mr. H. D. Clarke, J.P. (Congregationalist), occupied the chair, and made the presentation, which consisted of a cheque for £42. The Chairman of the School Board (the Vicar of St. Paul's), the Chairman of the Liberal Association, the Chairman of the Band of Hope Union, the Head-Master of the Pupil Teachers' Centre, and representatives of the Spiritualists, the Unitarian ministers of the district, and Mr. Dean's congregation, gave addresses referring to his educational, temperance, political, hospital, religious, and other work in the town, and the great regret that was felt at his departure. Mr. Dean has removed to Loughborough.

To Correspondents.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—C. D. B.; G. W. B.; F. A. E.; E. M. G.; J. P. H.; M. H. J.; R. J. J.; R. M.; H. S. S.; E. M. W. The invitation to the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties to meet next year at Hastings has, we are glad to hear since Tuesday's meeting, been definitely confirmed.

NEWARK-ON-TRENT FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

We are now glad to announce that through the generous donations of friends throughout the country, inclusive of local contributions (£45), we have realised £100, this, together with a promised grant of £10, brings us to within £15 of the amount of the debt on our Church Building. Nevertheless, we were sanguine of getting a total of £150, which would enable us to carry out much needed improvements in our Organ and Heating apparatus.

We now earnestly appeal for further donations.

Twelve Hymns & Their Writers

Biographical Sketches and Lesson Notes.

BY

REV. VALENTINE D. DAVIS, B.A.

Cloth, 1s. net, postage 3d.

The plan of this little book was to select twelve hymns such as it would be good to learn by heart, and by different authors, whose lives would furnish matter for an interesting biographical sketch with some useful lesson in it, while the hymns also should provide material for further lessons.—From Preface.

The Writers treated are:—

MILTON,	WESLEY,	NORMAN MACLEOD,
KEN,	COWPER,	SAMUEL LONGFELLOW,
WATTS,	OBERLIN,	ALICE CARY,
TENNYSON,	WHITTIER,	JOHN JOHNS.

The British Friend says:—"The sketches of character are delightful from the delicacy and taste with which the author delineates the trend of thought in each of his subjects. The Hymns are brief but well chosen, and well worth remembering for the thoughts they express."

The Christian Life says:—"The idea is excellent. . . . The hymns are not only suitable for children, but will be useful companions in their learner's mind throughout life."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE attention of our readers (especially such of them as live anywhere within hail of Leeds) is directed to the autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on Monday and Tuesday next, Oct. 21 and 22. Full particulars of the proceedings are given in our advertising columns, from which it will be seen that the Sunday School Association has also arranged for an interesting conference—a new feature at these meetings. A very hearty welcome has been extended to the Association and its friends by the minister and congregation of Mill Hill Chapel, and all intending visitors, who have not already done so, should communicate without delay with Mr. E. Basil Lupton, 14, East-parade, Leeds, so that arrangements may be made for their reception.

THE new session at Manchester College, Oxford, opened on Monday, when the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., the Tate Lecturer, gave the inaugural address, a full report of which will be found in our present issue. The session opens with an unusually large number of students, regular and special. It is interesting to note that Miss von Petzold, after graduating at Edinburgh, has come up as a regular student for the ministry, while Miss H. M. Johnson, well known as an ardent Temperance worker, especially on behalf of the children, and author of one of our S.S.A. manuals on "Jeremiah and his Times," is attending lectures at the College. Mr. V. R. Shinde, of Poonah, Bombay, and Mr. Z. Toyosaki, of Japan, as we have already noted, are also among the students. The Transylvanian churches, to our regret, have not this year been able to send a student.

THE friendships formed at the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in London last May will be renewed at the assembly of the Protestantenbond, which will take place at Utrecht on Oct. 29 and 30, when the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., of Liverpool, will represent the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. We rejoice that such an excellent representative from England has been found to undertake this mission to Holland. It is all the more important because the meeting of the International Council in 1903 may be held in that country.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, last Sunday morning, and is to continue to preach fortnightly at the morning service until the end of March. Needless to say that last Sunday the chapel was completely filled. Mr. Brooke's lectures at University College are to begin, as we announced last week, on Thursday evening, Oct. 31—though, as he told a representative of the Echo (Oct. 15), they are not written yet. The Echo secured a column and a half of pleasant talk from Mr. Brooke about Mazzini, Tennyson, Browning and Carlyle.

THE Free Trade Hall in Manchester was completely filled on Tuesday morning at the Autumnal Meeting of the Congregation Union, when Dr. Joseph Parker, the President, gave his address on "The United Congregational Church," aiming at the Federation of Congregationalism throughout the world. Dr. Parker had been forbidden by his doctors to go to Edinburgh for the recent meeting of the Baptist Union, and has cancelled all other engagements beyond his own work at the City Temple, but he was determined at all risks to deliver this Presidential address, and happily appears to have done so without serious consequences to his health. The Address is the outcome of a widespread dissatisfaction with the present condition of Congregational organisation. The United Church, Dr. Parker urged, must have more helpful oversight of ministers, and see that proper provision is made for their old age; the colleges and various societies must be brought into more vital connection with the body as a whole, and the separate churches must be drawn more closely together, on the basis of County Unions, as members of the one United Church. Incidentally Dr. Parker declared his opposition to the introduction of doctrinal clauses into Trust deeds. "It is the glory of Congregationalism," he said, "that it has no creed, yet it is the still greater glory of Congregationalism that it has a vital and imperishable faith"; as to which, he later declared that the United Church would "never drop the red banner of Calvary." The President's proposals were referred to the Churches and the County Unions for consideration.

THE Rev. John Hunter, D.D., is to enter on his ministry at the King's Weigh House Church, Duke-street, Grosvenor-square, W., to-morrow (Sunday), and is announced to preach regularly, morning and evening, until the end of November, also holding a brief devotional service on Thursday evenings at 8.15. On Oct. 27, which is Citizen Sunday, Dr. Hunter is to preach in the morning on "Church and City," and in the evening on "The Apathy of the Average Citizen; a Plea for Home Patriotism." The ministry of the Congregational Churches in London, will be greatly strengthened by Dr. Hunter's coming. Among the notes in his Church Calendar we find the following :—

> The King's Weigh House Church is Congregational, or Independent; free (that is) from all external ecclesiastical control; a self-governing society in all matters relating to its own worship and work. It invites and welcomes to its membership all disciples of Jesus Christ. It holds that beyond the simple and separate assembly or "congregation of faithful people" the only true and catholic unity consists in the recognition (without formal alliance with them) of all Christian Churches of every name as sections of the one Universal Church. The flock of Christ is one, but it is gathered into many folds.

We note with interest that last Sunday the Rev. E. I. Fripp, of Mansfield, occupied Dr. Hunter's old pulpit at Trinity Church, Glasgow, lecturing on the following evening on "The Pre-Raphaelites and their Message." Our readers will remember that not long ago the Rev. Stopford Brooke also preached at Trinity Church.

DR. OLIVER LODGE, F.R.S., Principal of Birmingham University, gave the opening address last Saturday at University College, Liverpool, in which he was until recently one of the most distinguished teachers. His address was a plea for a Liverpool University as an integral part of a great community. At the close of the address a bust of Dr. Lodge, presented to the College, was unveiled, and he himself unveiled a companion bust of Mr. William Rathbone, both the work of Mr. Allan. In doing so, Dr. Lodge said that when he came to Liverpool he found men of a higher type than he had been accustomed to—men engaged in business, yet whose every effort was for the welfare of the community, and whose wealth was a blessing to themselves and to everyone in their neighbourhood. In asking the authorities to accept that bust, he said it was a memento of as high an example of the type he had described as could be found. Virtute extendere vires was the inscription on the bust, and he believed it to be the absolute truth—that the man's power and influence had been emphasised and magnified a thousandfold by his extreme goodness and active practice of virtue. At a meeting of the Court of Governors the same afternoon, Mr. J. W. Alsop, Dr. Caton, Mr. C. W. Jones and the Rev. J. Sephton were elected members of the Council, and Mr. W. B. Bowring and the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, D.Sc., were two of the five new governors elected.

The Crisis, a Quarterly Review, of strong democratic sympathies and earnest reforming zeal, edited by the Hon. Rollo Russell, reaches with October its fourth number. Burning questions of social reform and of national and international politics have been dealt with in successive numbers, with fearless enthusiasm for righteousness and often with trenchant force. (Watts and Co. 6d. quarterly; annual subscription, 2s. 6d. post free.) To the October number Mr. Russell contributes the following lines:—

THE FATHERLAND.

With the Sword of the Spirit.

England! thou chief of States, whose glorious name
Has drawn the world by freedom and by love
Rather than fear, enrol not every shame
Borrowed from despots and the sorry grove
Of mishewn idols in barbaric lands;
Banish thy new-found flatterers, Waste and Death,
Bring Peace and Gladness in thy bounteous hands,
And win a destiny with eyes of faith.
Truth, pale and bleeding, yet would seek thy fields;
Thou know'st her not, who wast her dearest son;
O give her countenance again, who yields
The noblest fruit to deeds in justice done;
Then shalt thou flourish and thy heart be strong,
And in that Empire none shall do thee wrong.

Referring to the address of the Rev. Frank Walters at Newcastle, on "Twentieth-century Unitarianism," which we published on Oct. 5, a Birmingham correspondent writes:—

"The Rev. Frank Walters no doubt believes that he is 'only stating a fact' when he says that 'any Wesleyan minister who publicly denied the dogma of everlasting punishment would be unfrocked and excommunicated.' Knowing something of the intellectual and religious life of this neighbourhood the statement surprised me, and I at once drew the attention of a very intelligent business friend, a Wesleyan circuit steward, to the paragraph in your issue of 5th inst. My friend was astonished that Mr. Walters should know so little of the progress of liberal Christian views among Wesleyan ministers during the last quarter of a century. He declared to me that he has not heard for many years from a Wesleyan pulpit a sermon in which that dogma was taught, and that nine out of ten of their young ministers openly disavow their belief in it. I am assured also that a very large proportion of the older ministers do not teach it dogmatically, but with the reticence so grave a subject as the 'Future punishment' of the impenitent demands."

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

Sir,—There are but few of your readers, I imagine, who will be able to derive much satisfaction from the perusal of the proceedings of this Assembly on Tuesday last. A more barren or disastrous report I never read. There were 112 ministers and delegates present, and so far as it appears not one of them expressed a word of regret at the tragedy that was being read out by the Secretary of the Assembly. Three efforts to plant new churches had failed during the year—they had been abandoned as "forlorn hopes," and two or three more are in such a precarious state that no one will be surprised if by this time next year they, too, have gone under. The Assembly's Committee give no substantial ground for believing that this loss will be balanced by efforts made in other directions. What collective or individual help did the churches of the Assembly give to the "forlorn" and struggling little congregations that were visibly soon to become complete failures? It would be interesting to know. If there is any distinct purpose the Assembly has in view, beyond shunting the Unitarian name, I suppose it is to give mutual encouragement and help to the congregations in union with it, and for the stronger to aid the weaker. None of these ventures could have been thought hopeless when projected; and consider the labour and the self-sacrifice the pioneers who first broke ground and kept the little assemblies together for a time must have spent in trying to establish them! All honour to such brave hearts! I fear they failed for the want of better support. There is an ugly look about all this and irresistibly reminds one of what we sometimes read in the papers of a number of callous-hearted people standing on the banks of the river and seeing their comrades drown without lending a hand to save. No speaker appears to have expressed a word of regret at this failure, but all seem to have taken it rather as so many incumbrances cleared out of the way, leaving thereby more resources for those strong enough to endure. But what disheartens one about this Assembly most is that it seems to have no high spiritual or moral object in view. Its theological faith, if it has any, is very much hidden, and is often described as "Anything arian," "Nothing in particular," or "Nondescript." Now one cannot get up any enthusiasm for nourishing negatives, or indulging in discussions of abstract theories; and why, seeing that the members of the Assembly, if they are anything, are Unitarians, they should be so eager to ignore their distinguishing faith is a puzzle to most of us, seeing that they are not averse to applying for help to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the London District Unitarian Society. Only one of all the speakers at the meeting ventured to breathe the obnoxious name, and he did it in a casual, cold, and half-repellant way; "he did not want," he said, "the whole of England to become Unitarian." Why not? And would it be such an awful disaster if it did? For my part I should be glad to see all England agreed on anything, save for the sake of a bigger England, to run about bellowing for War. If to hide the name is only a "trap to catch a sunbeam" in the shape of any of the orthodox "Free Churches" as they call themselves, I am not aware that the plan has resulted in the capture of a single evangelical congregation or a solitary individual. As if to reveal what lack of spiritual zeal or purpose there is in this Assembly the principal resolution passed is one "to take cognisance of public and national questions in which moral and religious issues are involved and report thereon to the Assembly." So that after being discussed by newspapers, periodicals, and on platforms we are to have a rehash of them at these annual meetings. Mercy! oh, mercy! Are there some men utterly void of the bowels of compassion?

LITERATURE.

MAKERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.*

We shall not begin our notice of Mr. Armstrong's book, as some critics have done, by quarrelling with its title, or with the selection of his "Makers." An American reviewer naturally looks for Lincoln, and, not finding him, is malcontent; and in this country those who are so inclined may exercise a large amount of ingenuity in deciding which thirteen "Makers" they would have chosen, if the selection had been in their hands. But for our own part we are thankful to accept and to enjoy Mr. Armstrong's lectures as they were given in the course of his ministry at Hope-street Church, Liverpool, and as they are now published in a very interesting and stimulating book.

In planning the series, Mr. Armstrong did not attempt the impossible task of determining who were the thirteen who could be accurately described as "The Makers of the Century," but he chose a number of representative men and women, each distinguished in his or her own sphere, some holding incontestably the highest place, at least among their own people, and all representing influential forces which certainly helped largely in making the nineteenth century what it was. Carlyle, Darwin, Gladstone, George Eliot, Ibsen, Matthew Arnold, Bradlaugh, Watts, Mazzini, Queen Victoria, J. H. Newman, Stanley, and Martineau, is the list, all English, except Ibsen and Mazzini; and it is no fault, but rather an added interest in such a series of studies, that the selection of more than one of these "Makers" should have been partly determined by the special influence they have exerted upon the lecturer's own thought and life, or by some personal contact with himself. The lecture on the Queen was given on the Sunday evening following her death, and took the place of a projected lecture on Herbert Spencer, while quite recently in his lectures on "Faith and Doubt in the Century's Poets" (James Clarke and Co. 2s. 6d.) Mr. Armstrong had dealt with Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning. Tennyson and Ruskin were taken by other lecturers in the "Century" course.

These thirteen, as we have said, are discourses given from the pulpit as part of a religious service; and if anyone wants a complete vindication of such Sunday-evening lectures, we would say, get and read this book. Here are studies which go to the heart of life, in its deepest aspects, rich in human interest, vivid in presentment, so that there could be no listlessness in those who hear, and making strong and direct appeal, as the true preacher always must, to conscience and the loftiest ideal.

Carlyle Mr. Armstrong has put in the first place as the greatest preacher of the century, and one to whom now more than ever there is need that we should attend, —the preacher of earnestness and veracity. Closest akin to him with his gospel of the "Everlasting Yea" are Gladstone, Mazzini and Martineau, the last as "Prophet-Philosopher," the other two as "Statesman" and "Patriot." The lecture on Gladstone is one of those enriched by personal reminiscence, as in this vivid picture:—

I recall the scene in the early autumn of 1896, when Gladstone made, at Hengler's Circus, Liverpool, the last of his great orations. See the old man with slow and dragging steps advancing from the door behind the platform to his seat before that sea of eager faces. The figure is shrunken. The eyelids droop. The cheeks are as parchment. Now that he sits, his hands lean heavily upon his staff. We think, "Ah! it is too late; the fire has flickered out; the speech will be but the dead echo of bygone glories." But lo! he rises. The colour mantles to his face. He stands erect, alert. The great eyes open full upon his countrymen. Yes, the first notes are somewhat feeble, somewhat painful; but a few minutes pass, and the noble voice falls as the solemn music of an organ on the throng. The eloquent arms seem to weave a mystic garment for his oratory. The involved sentences unfold themselves with a perfect lucidity. The whole man dilates. The soul breaks out through the marvellous lips. Age? Not so: this is eternal youth. He is pleading for mercy to an outraged people, for fidelity to a national obligation, for courage and for conscience in a tremendous crisis. And the words from the Revised Version of the Psalms seem to print themselves on the listener's heart: "Thou hast made him but little lower than God, and crownest him with glory and honour."

The lecture on Martineau, which is the last of the series, concludes also the final study of three churchmen, the account of John Henry Newman being followed by a winning picture of Dean Stanley, but not without unhesitating criticism of the Broad Church position. In Martineau, speaking from the pulpit of the church built for him in 1848, Mr. Armstrong comes to the "Maker" to whom he himself stood nearest in reverence and in intellectual and spiritual kinship:—"My tutor for the six years of my college life, the master of my thinking throughout the years of my maturer manhood." The only criticism of the lecture that we have to offer is on two points of chronology. When Martineau came to Liverpool in in 1832, Mr. Thom was not, as Mr. Armstrong says, still at the Park Chapel, but had been already since August, 1831, the minister of Renshaw-street Chapel. And in describing the progress of Martineau's thought to the spiritual philosophy of which he became the great representative, Mr. Armstrong says that he took with him to Germany in 1848 "the characteristically English doctrine that utility was the criterion of right"; but in the Preface to the "Types of Ethical Theory," Martineau describes how his fresh studies at Berlin brought him into the same plight, "in respect of the cognitive and aesthetic side of life" that had already befallen him in regard to the moral, and tells of how already in 1841 Mill noted that he had broken with the Utilitarian school. And are not the "Endeavours after the Christian Life" testimony to the same effect?

Of the other lectures we should find it difficult to choose any one as of pre-eminent interest, they all reach so high a level. The service of Natural Science to religion is fully recognised in the lecture on "Darwin," while its limitations are also clearly brought out in this passage, following a statement as to the doctrine of Evolution and its bearing on our thought of God:—

If you ask Darwin's own position with regard to these transcendent themes, he would reply, "I am but a man of science of moderate ability, with little power of abstract thought. I only contribute certain facts, and try to show how life has developed on the earth. Concerning God, I affirm not; I deny not. Take my facts and weld them as you will in the structure of your spiritual philosophy." I myself had a letter from him long ago, in which he said that he had never been able to arrive at a full conviction of the reality of a personal God. Years after, in his "Life and Letters," appeared notes and memoranda in which he made the same confession. But he intimated, and not without some sadness, that so immersed had his mind been in scientific observation, that the capacity of his early manhood, to be moved by music and by poetry, had failed him, and that sublime scenery had lost its power to make him conscious of a presence Divine breathing through wood and glade. But all these higher experiences of the soul he treated with respect; and he never uttered or wrote one word which, legitimately understood, tends to subversion of our faith in Him who weaves the ages as a work upon the loom.

The lecture on George Eliot touches our deepest sympathies in its study of the ethical teaching of the great novelist, so potent to awaken a sense of the earnestness of life and the transcendent significance of duty. Maggie Tulliver is selected as the chief instance of George Eliot's power in ethical analysis, but the searching lessons to be derived from the delineations of Lydgate and Bulstrode in "Middlemarch" and Tito in "Romola" are also forcibly presented. The lecture on Ibsen deals with the same most human problems. In this we confess to have found the study of Brand more luminous than that of Peer Gynt.

Matthew Arnold has long had a great attraction for Mr. Armstrong. Twenty years ago, in a little volume on "Latter Day Teachers," containing six lectures delivered in the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, Arnold was one of the subjects, and as poet Mr. Armstong dealt with him in "Faith and Doubt in the Century's Poets." It is as "critic" that he appears in this series, and particularly as critic of the Bible and of the fundamental conceptions of religion. The lecturer gives a clear account of Arnold's most helpful teaching, while pointing out no less clearly his defects. We will allow ourselves one more quotation, referring to the great critic's elucidation of the Bible.

He desired to quicken in the men of to-day a sense of the feeling breathing through it all, and an appreciation of the deep wisdom so often underlying its utterances. And so all through his writings you will find the quotations from Scripture which he weaves into his argument wonderfully fresh and alive—not like the dead inscriptions of a forgotten age, or the articles of a dictionary for the proving or refuting of a dogma, but like the words of men speaking to us now eye to eye in our own tongue out of the deep experience of life. And I would particularly commend to any of you who desire to know how real and alive and helpful even the difficult Epistles may be made by an understanding and sympathetic interpreter, the little book called "St. Paul and Protestantism," where that noble Apostle appears, not teaching the doctrines of orthodoxy at all, which his writings have been tortured to support, but pouring out lessons of life like those of Jesus himself, how self-renunciation is the secret of gladness, and how self-control and love are more than any theology the intellect of man ever constructed.

"There is nothing recondite in these studies," Mr. Armstrong says in the Preface; they are addressed not to the critic or the widely read, but to the average thoughtful man or woman, and especially the young man or woman of our time.

To such the book is to be specially commended, and we can well understand how fascinating its study might be made to a class of young men under capable direction, with its suggestions not only of vivid interest in the great personalities described, but of helpful discussion of the supreme questions of life. We should be glad to think that in many reading circles during the coming winter these lectures may be taken up, and to many solitary Postal Mission correspondents the book would surely be a most welcome visitant.

"THE BIBLE AND ITS THEOLOGY."*

This is the fifth edition of a work which has long been highly valued as a scholarly examination of Liddon's famous Bampton Lectures and other more recent works of controversial divinity relating more especially to the Atonement and Biblical Inspiration. Dr. Vance Smith's earliest production soon after leaving college was a review of Dr. Pye-Smith's popular work on "Sacrifice," and he is a high authority on that subject as well as other branches of orthodox theology. There is a widespread feeling of impatience with controversial discussions, and many Unitarians are prone to think that they have become useless and unprofitable; but, as Dr. Vance Smith justly contends, "so long as works by influential divines of the Church of England continue to be published in exposition and defence of the prevailing theology, so long will it be necessary, again and again, to recall Christian people to more rational and truthful views of the origin, character, and interpretation of those Scriptures in which the common forms of theological belief claim to find their justification." It has long been the opinion of thoughtful observers that Orthodoxy will be undermined, and is rapidly being shaken to its foundations, by the searching criticism of the history of the Biblical records rather than by direct controversial assault or the old-fashioned battle of texts. But while our author evidently admits this, he addresses himself "more especially to those who are accustomed to a special and conservative idea of the importance of the Bible as a depository and teacher of religious truth"—who, in fact, make their appeal primarily to the Scriptures; and to such students, if they will only open their minds to both sides, this volume in its new and greatly enlarged edition will be of the greatest value. If it did not succeed in changing their theological opinions it would at least serve to show how much can fairly be said for the heterodox views often so greatly misrepresented and bitterly denounced by the partisans of the popular theology.

It is not necessary for The Inquirer to review at any length the successive editions of a work like this, but it is only due to the venerable author to acknowledge gratefully his strenuous efforts on behalf of a purer Christian theology, continued even to advanced age, and to draw our readers' attention to the new matter in this valuable work. The chapter on "The Death of Christ" is brought up to date by the addition of criticisms on the new "Evangelical Free Church Catechism" issued in 1898, and an Appendix on the recent Theological Symposium on the "Atonement in Modern Religious Thought," republished from the columns of the Christian World, noteworthy as an indication that the old Orthodox or Evangelical doctrine "seems to disappear altogether, only the name being retained." The twenty-sixth chapter is a very valuable essay on a subject which lies at the root of the whole controversy—"The Bible: its Inspiration, and its relation to Reason and Conscience," to which there is a new Appendix on the essay on "Inspiration" in Lux Mundi, noting its remarkable admissions. With these additions Dr. Vance Smith's book—the crown of a long, scholarly, and most honourable career—is rendered still more valuable as a controversial store of polished weapons for a courteous theological warfare, and may well be commended to the attention of our Postal Missions.

The present writer observes with much interest and entire concurrence that the author—in common with Dr. Martineau and other prominent Liberal religious writers—still holds his old ideal to which he thinks "all religious and free-minded men in our own country will gradually and gladly draw nearer." That ideal is "the union and combination of all Christian people of this land, especially those of the Protestant name, in one comprehensive English Church on the basis of the words and the example of Christ." That idea may not be attainable for many years to come, but those of us who are "unwilling Nonconformists" for conscience sake cannot but regard it as an ideal well worth living and working for in faith and hope. ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In the October Contemporary a memorial article on the late President McKinley, written with intimate personal knowledge, by a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is followed by a very clever and amusing article by Poultney Bigelow on President Roosevelt, opening with a parallel between Roosevelt and the Emperor of Germany, who are almost of the same age. The new President and the friend who so vividly describes him were students together in the law school of New York. The article concludes with an earnest plea for a congress of English-speaking, self-governing States and Colonies to establish a Court of Arbitration for the settlement of all disputes among themselves. To such a Congress the writer thinks that delegates from every section in South Africa might be invited, for "Boers and English rapidly melt into Afrikanders; and all intelligent Africanders speak English and think as liberty-loving, self-governing men of our own race. They are not people who can be flogged into obedience." The President's influence, he thinks, will be on the side of an Anglo-American Alliance. In the same number Miss Hobhouse renews her plea for the women and children in the Concentration Camps. "Three months ago," she writes, "I pleaded hard for immediate action. In that interval nearly 3,000 lives have been lost, of which hundreds might have been saved. Death is busy while slow 'inquiries' are still being made." It is a heart-breaking story. Social reformers should note Mr. Thomas Holmes's second article on "The Making of the Hooligan." The Rev. C. J. Shebbeare shows vigorous fight against the sacramentalists in his article on "The Intellectual Strength of the Low Church Position," and the Rev. J. O. F. Murray writes with very warm appreciation of the late Bishop Westcott, some of whose finest essays were first published in this Review.

In the Nineteenth Century and After the most timely article, which occupies hardly four pages, is that by Mr. G. J. Holyoake on "Anarchism," wisely distinguishing between the very different kinds, and showing the futility of the philosophic but quite benevolent anarchist. "I hate anarchy," Mr. Holyoake writes, "alike in military or civil life, and all that leads to it or incites revenge by death, as does the new doctrine—that 'leniency is a mistake'—that it is weakness or cowardice. Can there be any wonder that some people, for the ends of their hatred, better these perilous instructions? And so incited, the pitiless sentiment acts equally in republics and monarchies." Sir Michael Foster, M.P., asks "Should the University of London include Polytechnics?" with a plea that the instruction they provide should render them worthy of inclusion. The Hon. Mrs. Goodhart contributes some interesting "Fragments of Mr. Gladstone's Conversation," recorded during his visit to Naples in the winter of 1888-9. Dr. Henry R. Percival, writing on Canon Gore's "The Body of Christ" as an Epoch-marking (not making) book, rejoices over the Canon's soundness in Catholic doctrine, after the painful impression left (upon the writer) by Lux Mundi and Gore's Bampton Lectures. In the Monthly Review the most attractive article to us is that by J. G. Legge on "Children's Workshops in Sweden," with suggestion of what might be done in this country. Mr. Robert Dell, a convert to Catholicism, answers the question which Father Gerard recently asked, and professed himself unable to answer, "Is distrust of Jesuits reasonable?" Mr. Dell shows how the distrust is as widespread within the Church as outside, and considers the Society a hindrance to the spread of Catholicism.

The Society combines the qualities of a fussy, interfering woman with those of an officious detective officer. The one thing Jesuits never can do is to mind their own business and allow other people to mind theirs; they must, to use a homely phrase, have a finger in every pie. And it is not merely that they are interfering and inquisitive, but that they also love to rule and domineer; a not surprising revenge of nature on those who have forfeited so completely their personal freedom.

The illustrated article this month is on one of the rare pictures of Paolo Uccello, his Battle-piece in the National Gallery.

The Humane Review is a quarterly, but we will call attention here to an article in the October number by the Rev. J. Verschoyle on "Slaughter-House Reform," a forcible plea on grounds both of humanity and public health for the substitution of the public abattoir for the private slaughter-house, and also for reform in methods of slaughter.

THE MEDIÆVAL CHRONICLER IN ENGLAND.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

IV.

Gerald of Wales.

There is even less of the monk, or for that matter, of the cleric, about Gerald of Wales, though it was his ambition until near the close of his life to be the Bishop of St. David's. Of princely rank and education he fought obstinately with Henry II. for his appointment to the see, and crossed the Alps to obtain the sympathy of the Pope. He had, no doubt, a large measure of Fluellen's sense of the importance of his country and himself, but he was too stirring and too able a man for the King to trust him with the spiritual leadership of the rebellious Welsh. His audacity shows itself in his writings as in his actions. In contempt of his critics who regarded him as a mere popular author, he poured out volume after volume of the most unconventional and startling narrative. "I have entirely thrown away," he said, "the old and dry style." He might be called the father of light literature in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. He went to Ireland in 1185 with Prince John, and wrote two books, one a description (the earliest we have) of the country, the other an account of the war of conquest. In 1188 he accompanied Archbishop Baldwin in a journey through Wales, preaching the crusade. The result of this was an Itinerarium per Walliam. All these books are practically the work of a special correspondent.

The Chief Journalist of his Time.

Gerald, we might say, was the chief journalist of his time. He is always entertaining, whether his subject be Ireland, Wales, Hugh of Lincoln, or himself. And sometimes from his scrappy and colloquial information we gather matter of the first importance. For instance, what a light is thrown upon the unrecorded thought and experience of the lower clergy by the story of the priest whom Gerald, as archdeacon, rebuked for not using fresh wafers in his ministration. "What is this that you say?" cried the priest angrily, "you and your religion are equally odious. Do you suppose that this bread is made flesh or this wine becomes blood? Can you suppose that God the Creator of all things took flesh of a woman? that He consented to suffer? Do you think that a virgin can conceive? Do you think that after our bodies have been turned into dust they will rise again? This is hypocrisy. These things are the inventions of grey-beards to strike terror into men and bridle their unruly passions." This remarkable outburst is made still more remarkable by Gerald's comment, "Oh, how many are there, like this man at this time, concealed unbelievers!" One would very much like to know how many. Heresy was abroad. Roger of Howden tells us that there were Albigensies in Henry II.'s dominions, and that he was deaf to fanatical appeals to bring them, as was done in France, to the stake. "This was a thing," he says, "the King would by no means allow." Deer-stealers were more severely punished by Henry than unbelievers. Map, who had experience of the game-laws as a magistrate, bears witness to the insolence of foresters and the detestation in which they were held. One day when the King was staying with Hugh, prior of Selwood, afterwards Hugh of Lincoln, the door was besieged rudely by a party of keepers. "Who are they?" asked the prior, angrily. "Foresters," was the reply. "Then foris stent," he answered, "at the door let them stand." The King, hearing the pun, came out laughing; but Hugh cried, "This matter, Sire, touches you; for when poor folk, whom these fellows torment, enter Paradise, you shall stand at the door."

English Fiction.

These were the days of Robin Hood, and of the story of his forerunner, Hereward the Wake. In the Gesta Herwardi the famous outlaw, after escaping from Ely, takes refuge in the Brunneswald and then in the forest of Northampton, where, with his merry men, he reverses his horse's shoes, shoots in the greenwood, and captures a fat Norman abbot. If I had time I would like to say much of this fine old story, but I must be content to point out the significance of such a work of fiction being put together in the scriptorium, and so English and anti-Norman a tale.

Growth of the English Spirit.

The English spirit gathered strength all through the reigns of Richard and John, and began to speak out in that of Henry III.

As I have said, the struggle between Stephen and the Empress Maud was primarily personal and feudal, and only in a secondary degree political. It was a war chiefly between families, or the Crown and the nobility. The English folk, in so far as they took sides at all, helped Stephen, the Welsh Maud. The clergy, in the main, held aloof. Their principal interest was ecclesiastical. The chroniclers at this epoch make more of a miracle or an episcopal quarrel than of a political conflict. Even those who show some concern for the civil war, as Orderic, Henry of Huntingdon and William of Malmesbury, are much more occupied with ecclesiastical affairs. They stand up for their monastery against the bishops, for their bishops against the Pope, and for the Pope against the King. That, speaking generally, is the due order of allegiance in the eyes of the chronicler before Magna Charta. But as the English speech became again the language of letters, and English architecture, setting aside the Norman models, grew native and original, and the English poor under the influence of the Friars began to raise their heads, Robert Grosstete as an English churchman, and Matthew Paris as an English chronicler, resisted both Pope and King.

Roger of Wendover.

Roger of Wendover, who was chronicler at St. Albans until 1135, was loyal in the old way, supporting the Pope against the Crown, and the Crown against the nation. He is a Romanist and a loyalist.

Matthew Paris.

But Matthew Paris, his successor, is a patriot. That is to say, he supports the King against the Pope, and the people against the King. He adds to the chronicle of his predecessor, in embodying it in his own, vigorous notes which leave no doubt as to his position. He puts in a word, for instance, for William Longbeard. How refreshing it is to read it! "Thus," he says, "William of the Beard was shamefully put to death by his fellow-citizens for asserting the truth and defending the cause of the poor, and if the justice of one's cause constitutes a martyr, we may surely set him down as one." Observe that new definition of a martyr. He dies not for the Pope, not for the Church, not for the King, but for Justice. In virtue of this loftier point-of-view, his great industry, his large experience of the world and knowledge of men, Matthew Paris will yield to none the claim of being the greatest of English chroniclers.

I have not time to say more on this head, much as I would like to, for I want to draw your attention to certain less recognised points in the chronicles of the thirteenth century—the century which Mr. Ruskin is inclined to put at the head of all the centuries, the century of the work and full influence of St. Francis of Assisi and St. Dominic, and of the birth and training of the mighty poet in whom the ideas of the middle-ages find their completest and highest expression.

Dantesque Elements.

In our chronicles we know that we are drawing towards Dante. The sense of the hereafter, which is always strong in times of strenuous and noble life, expresses itself in visions of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise which are full of spiritual thought. In Orderic Purgatory is represented as a bridge over a river of fire, with the gate of Paradise at the other end. William of Malmesbury reports Hariulf's story of the Frankish Karl III., who was led into Inferno by a guide with a luminous thread, and saw relatives, bishops, and others in suffering, his own father in a cask of boiling water, and another cask for himself if he should not quickly repent. In Gerald of Wales we read of Judas, "the most miserable, but not pitiable, traitor, chained to a rock in the sea, and deprived of the blessing of light"; of Rachel and Leah as the types of contemplation and activity, and of the empyrean "or heaven of heavens, the Celestial courts thronged with multitudes." In Roger of Wendover's chronicle are two visions, both of great interest. In one a monk is taken by an old man, St. Nicholas, through Purgatory to Paradise. Going toward the east along a smooth road they come to a deadly marsh, then a dark vale, and, finally, to a sulphurous plain, where evil spirits undergo various torments. Among them the monk recognises some old intimates, including a goldsmith. "If you know him, speak," says the guide. Then he learns that in his life-time the man committed fraud, and as a punishment is made to count and handle and swallow burning coins. In Paradise they walk among flowers and sweet odours, and the music of the praise of God. In the third and highest heaven the saints circle about God's throne, in motion, worshipping amidst "melody of a wondrous sweetness." We may also see the symbolism of the coming poetry and art. Pope Innocent III. sends King John four golden rings with divers jewels. Their roundness signifies eternity, which has neither beginning nor end. Their number denotes the four cardinal virtues—justice, fortitude, prudence, and temperance. Gold stands for wisdom, the emerald faith, the sapphire hope, the pomegranate charity, the topaz the light of good works. We read also of symbolical actions, like that of the woman Joinville speaks of, who was met in the street carrying in one hand a pot full of fire, and in her left a flask of water. When asked what she was about, she replied that she would burn up Paradise with the fire and drown Hell with the water; "because," she said, "I wish not that anyone should do good for the reward of Paradise, nor avoid evil for fear of Hell; but every good ought to be done from the love of God." Gerald tells of a girl afflicted with a violent temper, who, when a monk remonstrated with her, struck him in the face. He endured it quietly, and presented the other cheek, which also she struck, harder than before. Then he offered his face again; "but," he says, "the evil spirit within her said, 'your patience has conquered me,' and she was cured."

* The second of two lectures delivered in Manchester College, Oxford, Aug. 5 and 6, in connection with the Summer Meeting of University Extension Students.

English Architecture.

Lastly, as these poetical and spiritual elements accumulate in England, as all over Europe, we read of our magnificent English architecture springing up in place of the Norman and foreign styles: Salisbury Cathedral with its spire, the angel-choir at Lincoln, the porticoes of Ely and St. Albans, and the most sacred building we have in this country, true symbol of England's recovery of her national freedom and national speech, and fitting resting place of our great English dead—Westminster Abbey.

FOR THE MAGNANIMITY OF ENGLAND.

Sir,—The serious letter which the Rev. W. J. Jupp has addressed to you upon our national duties at the present crisis, under the above heading, cannot fail to have attracted the earnest attention of many of your readers. It cannot, however much we respect the writer, be allowed to pass altogether unchallenged. There are not a few among us who, whilst they are no wit behind Mr. Jupp in their desire to bring this sad conflict to an end, cannot see with his eyes, or answer the searching questions he puts to us, in the way he would wish us to do.

Let us examine his letter more closely; it consists of certain statements and suggestions to which are added questions only capable of being answered in one way if Mr. Jupp is right in his premises. Finally, he enunciates a policy not very definite, but almost impossible to carry out. One of the most important statements in the letter is that England has proved to the two Republics that they cannot withstand her might, and that their power to permanently injure British interests by force of arms is once and for ever overthrown. Then follows the question, "Is that enough?" To this question, if the statements referred to are a true representation of the facts, the answer must be Yes. But are they? What warrant has Mr. Jupp for them, or for speaking, a little further on, in such confident terms of us as victors and of the Boers as a conquered people? Mr. Kruger and Dr. Leyds and their numerous Continental friends day by day insist that the position of the Boer forces is better than twelve months ago, and urge that if only the war can be maintained for a year or two longer England will tire of the war and be glad to withdraw on any terms. At the seat of war do we see any sign that the Boer leaders admit themselves conquered, or that they are prepared to accept terms other than those stated over and over again by Mr. Kruger—namely, absolute independence and arbitration as to other points at issue?

Mr. Jupp later proceeds to put this question to us: "Have we no greatness of soul as a nation whereby, with the calm dignity of conquerors, to hold out to the conquered offers of friendly conciliation such as they could accept?" Is not this question a trifle absurd in the face of the facts. It ignores, too, the efforts already made by the Government to come to terms with the Boer leaders in the field. On the 10th of this month Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, speaking at Oldham of this matter, used these words: "We have offered to the inhabitants of the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony greater liberties than are, I believe, enjoyed by the subjects of any European State. We have offered to them the position which has made French Canadians loyal and devoted subjects of the Crown." What more is possible after all that has passed? If Mr. Jupp seriously wishes us to go to Mr. Kruger and his Dutch advisers at The Hague and offer terms, my answer, though I say it with pain, must be an emphatic no.

If ever there was a case where the policy of "thorough" was the most merciful, this is one. Too long have we tried the policy of "meddle and muddle," and the result has been lamentable failure. Suppose the Republics were reinstalled and Mr. Kruger and Mr. Steyn allowed to return, what possible chance of permanent peace could there be in South Africa? The same troubles would arise again. Pretoria, Johannesberg and Bloomfontein would again become the happy hunting-ground of needy continentals, and Hollanders in particular, yet impossible almost for people of our own race. Pretoria would again be the rallying point for all that was inimical to this country in South Africa, and we should be unable to interfere unless actually attacked. Should such an abdication again take place, the end of British rule in South Africa would be certain. The sacrifices that have been made by our people, not only at home, but throughout our colonies, render such a policy inconceivable. Far better to have accepted the ultimatum levelled at our heads by Mr. Kruger and Mr. Steyn, which so many people now seem to have forgotten, than at the eleventh hour to patch up a peace which would assuredly be a disastrous inheritance for future generations in South Africa.

Nottingham, Oct. 13.

Sir,—Although I have already trespassed on your columns, you may possibly again find space for a few remarks in answer to Mr. Jupp's eloquent and earnest appeal for "magnanimity." His ideals are, indeed, such as now claim our admiration, and might claim our assent if facts were what he thinks they are, and if the world were what he wishes it to be. To make the world what it should be is the preacher's business, and, to succeed, he must influence and mould individual character; his appeal to the secular arm has always worked, and must always work, evil, whether that secular arm be wielded by an absolute king or by a democratic, parliamentary majority. A sense of this seems to me to underlie the steady objection there is to the interference of parsons in politics. The business of the statesman is to deal with facts and the world as they are, not as he thinks they should be. Hence the frequent wide divergence between the two. The policy of Magnanimity was tried by Mr. Gladstone; with what results, let tens of thousands of desolate homes, not only in South Africa, but also in England, Scotland, and Ireland, in Canada and Australia, reply. To prevent a renewal of such sacrifices, even after many years it may be, the vast majority of the British nation insist on the subjection of the Boers. It is a matter of self-defence. Whether the invasion of Natal and Cape Colony by Transvaalists two years ago was justified may be (although I do not think it is) matter for argument, but no one can justify the Orange Free State, with whom there had been no friction for fifty years, joining in that attack on us. To prevent both these countries re-arming and again fighting, they must be placed and held under British rule. There is not such a thing—except in words or dreams—as a half-way house between this and independence, which latter is practically the same thing as the "full independence" which Mr. J. Redmond, M.P., was told by Mr. Kruger was the only thing the Boers would accept.

But I do not believe that there is any widespread desire, such as Mr. Jupp somewhat uncharitably assumes, "to bring the Boers cringing to their feet." On the contrary, the Boers have repeatedly been informed that they would as soon as possible be granted the full status and equal rights of British citizens, the freest and most independent in the world.

I do not know at what date Mr. Jupp wrote, but his suppositions that "England has proved to the Republics that they cannot withstand her might," and that "their power to permanently injure British interests by force of arms is once and for ever overthrown" seem singularly inappropriate at a time when we have to keep 314,000 men in South Africa at a cost of a million sterling a week, and when, from one cause or another, we are losing nearly 1,000 men a month there; when the enemy have carried war, insurrection and rapine to within 60 miles of Cape Town, and have only just by the sacrifice of many self-devoted lives been turned back from an attempted re-invasion of Natal.

If ever there is a time when the individual should merge himself in his country's cause, when silence is noble, it surely is when that country is grappling with an enemy and its citizens' blood flowing unceasingly.

In conclusion, let me say that I have no prejudices against the Boers, whose good qualities I appreciate, nor have I ever had any financial interests in their country. My opinions have been formed by events and by such knowledge of history and human nature as I possess, but I cannot but be impressed by the unanimity of opinion in South Africa itself, including British and American ministers of religion, and the uniform opinion of the many merchants, officers and others from there, whom it has been my fortune to meet, that the war is just, and was both necessary and inevitable.

OBITUARY.

MISS ALICE MALLESON.

The news of the death, on Sept. 27, of Miss Alice Malleson, of Croydon, of which an old friend has sent us a notice this week, will recall grateful memories of the school at Hove House, Brighton, of which her father, the Rev. J. P. Malleson, was for so many years the head. Miss Malleson, who was sixty-eight years of age, had borne the sufferings of a painful illness for many months with great fortitude and patience, and death came to her as a welcome release. Brought up a Unitarian, Miss Malleson had been latterly a member of the Church of England, but without relinquishing her liberal sympathies. A notice contributed to the Croydon Guardian speaks of her in the following terms:—

"Since her earliest connection with Croydon, Miss Malleson's name has always been associated with all work that had to do with helping others, and uplifting her fellow-creatures. A Churchwoman by religious conviction, and a Liberal in her political views, her sympathies were wide, and her interests were not limited by any arbitrary distinctions of creed or politics. She was a member of the Christian Social Union, and took a practical interest in the work of such associations as the National Home Reading Union, and in the Industrial Co-operative Society. One of the last things she did in public was to deliver a lecture on the work of the Co-operative Holiday Association at the Y.M.C.A. Hall, towards the end of May. She also founded the Croydon branch of the National Union of Women Workers in 1891. But her name will always be specially connected in Croydon with the work of the Rescue and Preventive Association, of which she was also one of the original founders, and in which she was, up to the time of her last illness, one of the most indefatigable workers. It was due to her initiation that the Croydon Training Home was first started."

How deeply Miss Malleson's influence had been felt was manifest at the funeral service in the parish church. The Vicar of Croydon, assisted among others by the Rev. Philip Malleson, vicar of Great Tew (a nephew), conducted the service, and as the writer of the notice from which we have already quoted says, the glorious words of hope and confidence in the great resurrection lesson of the Burial Service, and the tender beauty of the hymns, seemed to gain a fresh significance as those present realised what a devoted life of loving service was ended here, only, indeed, to find a wider outcome in "the full-grown energies of heaven."

The inscription on Alfred's monument at Wantage, quoted from memory—and, as will be seen, from a very good memory—by Mr. Wicksteed in his article in The Inquirer of Sept. 14, we are informed is as follows:—

Alfred found learning dead,
And he restored it.
Education neglected,
And he revived it.
The laws powerless,
And he gave them force.
The Church debased,
And he raised it.
The land pillaged by a fearful enemy,
And he delivered it.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Revile not again.

The following story is better known in Arabia than in England, but it is one that is worth everyone's hearing, and that can be understood by all:—

The prophet Mahomet and his friend Ali were out walking together when they were met by a man who, on account of some fancied injury, began abusing and insulting Ali. There seemed no end to his bad language and false accusations. The venerable Ali bore this for some time in silence, not making the least attempt at reply or showing any indignation, but at length his patience gave way and he began to answer back. When he saw that, Mahomet passed on and left the two to settle their quarrel as best they could.

Some time after the friends met again, when Ali, deeply offended, said, "Why didst thou leave me alone to bear the abuse of that insolent fellow?" Mahomet replied, "Oh, Ali! while that man was denouncing thee so outrageously and thou wert silent, I saw ten angels around thee who took thy part and replied to him. But when thou didst begin to return his insults the angels one by one left thee, and I also departed."

All of us know how hard it is to be blamed for what is not really our fault, or to be called names that we do not deserve; to be "persecuted and reviled" never seems at all pleasant, and we do not easily understand what Jesus meant when he said that they are happy who are persecuted for righteousness sake. No one finds it easy to bear insult without making some reply. Our first impulse is always to return railing for railing.

Ali must have been a brave, strong-hearted man to have kept his peace so long as he did; perhaps some of us would have lost our tempers from the very first. To be insulted and denounced when we are quite innocent of any wrong, to be abused too, and reviled in the presence of one of our chief friends, surely that is about as severe a trial of our patience as we could well imagine.

In the story Ali, beginning well, breaks down and descends to the level of his persecutor. In our real life we must aim at so strengthening ourselves and training ourselves, that even when most unjustly denounced we shall be able in patience to possess our souls.

What did Mahomet mean by those ten angels of which he spoke, the angels which were Ali's best answers and his best protectors, the angels that seemed to disappear when he began to follow his enemy's bad example? It is not difficult to guess, and to see that those same angels protect and deliver us also when we are in similar conditions—blamed, persecuted, reviled.

We need not now name them all, but here are three, and we will see how they defend all who know themselves to be in the right.

First, the angel of a Good Conscience. If we are innocent, what does it matter to us how much we are accused? No amount of denouncing will turn right into wrong, truth into falsehood; all the abuse in the world will not make you guilty if in your own heart you know your own innocence. If one of our school companions says that we cheat and copy our answers from our neighbour's book, it is a disagreeable thing to hear; but if it is not true, then we can afford not to get angry, not to abuse in our turn, but, resting in our own good conscience, can wait till our accuser learns better. We may even be sorry that he should have thought so unkindly of us, and try to make things straight by thinking more kindly of him.

Then there is the Angel of Patience. So much goes wrong, so many people misunderstand each other, because they do not keep this angel in their hearts. If you were ever to try to understand how quarrels arose, not only between yourselves, but between men and women, and between the governments or the nations of the world, you would be surprised to find how a little consideration, a little patience in the beginning would have put most things right. Ali was patient at first, he waited to see if he could not explain this man's strange behaviour, but his patience gave out. Perhaps the man was mad, or he mistook Ali for someone else. At any rate shouting and violence, impatience of any sort, did not mend matters, but, on the contrary, made them ten times worse. We all find that at times we have to exercise patience even with our friends; it is a difficult but necessary lesson to learn that we have to be much more patient with those who are against us.

The last angel is Love. So long as Ali refrained from abusing in his turn it was possible to remember that, after all, the man there calling him such hard names and thinking so unkindly of him was, in a deep, true sense, his brother. He would remember that the man had his own sorrows and difficulties, his own ailments and infirmities, and would make allowance for his faults, sure that there was good in him as well. So long as he remained free from sharing the other's fault, Ali had sympathy and some degree of love for his fierce accuser; but directly he followed his example, all affection disappeared—the angel Love left him. For us, big or little, the same thing is true. Abuse, hard words, reviling of any sort, these things if done by us to others make us forget to love those who really are our brothers and sisters. As soon as hate creeps in, there is danger all around.

Let us try our best to bear bravely whatever is imposed upon us in error or through wilfulness, never returning evil for evil, railing for railing, but contrariwise—blessing.

Arthur Harvie.

The October Seed Sower, which opens with a sermon by the Editor, the Rev. Joseph Wood, on "The Education of Character," contains also an article by the Rev. Harrold Johnson on "The Angelus of Millet, or Worship," which, if we are not mistaken, has also appeared in the Christian Register. Another of Mr. Johnson's Millet studies is in the Register of Sept. 19.

In the New Kingdom for October there is an interesting biographical note, with a portrait, of one of our recent international visitors, Professor Montet, of Geneva, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding begins an account of his "Holiday in Transylvania," to which a note is added that he is preparing a lecturer on the subject with lantern slides from original photographs.

THE PREACHER'S CALLING.

THE searching and stimulating address given by the Rev. L. P. JACKS at the opening of the session at Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday, we should have been glad, but for lack of space, to print entire; but it will be published by the College, that it may receive the full consideration which is its due.

In the extended report which we publish to-day our readers will be able to follow Mr. JACKS's argument. We are inclined to have more faith in our Free Churches, and to trust that in the future they may prove plastic to the new spiritual forces which are undoubtedly at work in the world, and may be moulded to new forms of life and roused to more effective service. And when the new stirring of life, in contact with the deepest needs of men, has emerged into fuller consciousness, it will, as we believe, find that its foundation is in the Eternal Goodness, in a trust which cannot be shaken, and intimate communion with the heavenly FATHER, and that after all it must return to the old ideal of the Kingdom of GOD on earth. Its strength must always be in a firm grasp of the realities of present-day life, penetrated as they are, through and through, by spiritual forces, and its service must be of righteousness, national and civic, no less than personal, made effective by the supreme power of love. And that, with equal truth and insistence, must be said of our churches.

Mr. JACKS's dream of a great Preaching Order will be fascinating to many minds, but it will hardly become a reality until that seething of new life has taken more articulate form and is conscious of a definite purpose in the world. Yet without waiting for the Master-mind, the heaven-born leader, who alone could create such a new Order and control and direct its forces, is there nothing we can do with the instruments already in our hands, that we of the Free Churches may become more effective servants of Truth, Liberty, and Religion, to bring home that great ideal to the hearts of men and make the world feel its power?

The College, Mr. JACKS says, cannot give to its students all the training required to make them such preachers as the world needs. The training given at Oxford is indispensable, but there is an education not to be given in the class-room, but in direct contact with the world and the needs of men. Such training through actual experience and under friendly direction students already seek in great cities and among the churches during vacation, but this is work which needs to be more thoroughly organised and developed, and it may prove that the way would thereby open at the same time for the supply of other needs.

And now we will make a suggestion, not by way of urging any immediate revolution, but to sow another seed of thought, which in time may germinate and lead to most salutary growth. To an outside observer it must appear one of those absurdities to which our extreme individualism is too prone, that our Body should continue to maintain two colleges, out of all proportion to the number of the men to be trained and the churches to be supplied with ministers; and there are, we believe, many members of our own community, among those most devoted to its welfare, who, considering the needs and opportunities of our churches and the resources available for the maintenance and development of our religious work, strongly share that feeling. Manchester College is now established and nobly equipped at Oxford, and could be yet further equipped, to furnish the best available education that a college can give. Better surely that the whole force of our learning and spiritual culture should be concentrated there, and not divided as at present.

But something more is needed, for the oversight and training of men preparing for the ministry of religion; and our suggestion is that the Home Missionary College, reverting to its old title as a Board, might perform an inestimable service to our community, by devoting itself to the care of young men before they are ready for the Theological School at Oxford, and, further, using all available funds for bringing college students during vacation into direct contact with the people, in active service as missionaries among the poor or through participation in the work of some strong church. This, as we have said, is already done to some extent, but we believe could be more systematically and effectively done by a representative body devoted to such work. And that same Board might continue its direction of students for the first years after college, independent of any settled ministry, giving them such training, up to the measure of our present capacity, as in Mr. JACKS's dream, the young preachers of the new Order would receive. And if one heaven-born leader should arise to take direction of the new forces of our Church Militant, so much the better. But meanwhile, let the thought of concentration, and the longing for more effective strength and service, grow.

THE DESTINATION OF THE STUDENT: THE SETTLED MINISTRY & AN ALTERNATIVE:

AN ADDRESS AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION OF MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD, BY THE REV. L. P. JACKS, M.A., TATE LECTURER.*

I SHALL begin, gentlemen, by reminding you of a fact with which, as students of the history of religion, you are no doubt familiar. When we study the origin of a religious movement, like Christianity, what we see at first is the appearance in the world of a new Cause. There is at first no fixed community, no Church, no doctrine, and no law. Even the Cause, the presence of which makes so unwonted a stir, is hard to define. What the parent idea may be, and to what aim the messengers of that idea are bending their efforts—this can be answered only in large, vague, and general terms. We may, indeed, say the parent idea is the Fatherhood of God, and the ultimate aim is to establish the Kingdom of Heaven; but a moment's reflexion reveals that both these conceptions are fluid compounds, joint products of Affection, Reason, and Imagination, and, therefore, insusceptible of any close and fixed definition. Thus, although we are clearly conscious that a new Cause has appeared, and are made to feel its presence in its effects, its inward nature eludes our intellectual grasp. Students of the Gospels are, even now, unable to give a clear account of the mind of Christ; which is not to be wondered at, for I trust it may be said without irreverence that Christ, if challenged, would not have been able to give a clear account of himself. All we can be sure of at this early stage is the burst of new energy into life, the awakening of a new impulse, the liberation of the pent-up waters of the human soul, which little by little takes shape as some sort of definable cause. The settled ministry does not exist. Ministers there are, but their prime characteristic is not settlement, but a divine restlessness due to the inward burning of the prophetic fire. These men are apostles, and apostles to begin with are the sole messengers and custodians of the faith. Missionaries we will call them, if you will. Their attention is confined entirely to the Cause. They have no congregations whose interests, rightly claiming consideration, create a world of duties outside that of proclaiming the truth. They are not ecclesiastics even in the mildest sense of the term. Observe that I do not praise their condition. I do not even idealise it. It is proper only to a religious movement in its earliest phase. The time may come later when the apostolic character must be modified; when in place of the missionary, concerned only with the Cause, you must have the settled minister, the leader of a religious community having a fixed local habitation, the mouthpiece of their worship, the confidant of their experience, the friend of their trouble, an organiser of congregational work, a visiting pastor, a president of Sunday-schools, clubs, recreation societies and literary circles, a member of twenty or thirty committees, attendance at which requires half his time, and above all a man owning certain obligations to a wider body than his own congregation, charged with the maintenance of traditions, and surrounded on every hand with institutions to which the voice of conscience bids him be loyal. This is the change in the character of the minister which changed conditions require. I do not regard it as degeneration. I am content to call it development. But I think you will agree that the Cause must have attained a certain ripe maturity before its servants are justified in forsaking the pure apostolic character for that of the settled minister. And the question I am going to ask is whether the cause with which you and I are concerned is sufficiently mature at the present time that we should have but one idea as to the mode of serving it, and that the idea of the settled ministry.

Rapid Growth of Settled Forms.

You, gentlemen, as students of religious history, know how quickly the change of which I have spoken comes about. It is as certain as any of the laws of Nature can be that that which begins as inspiration will sooner or later take shape as doctrine. And the moment the impulse has taken fixed intellectual form, as it needs must do or perish, a like fixity begins to be created in all the surrounding conditions. Churches are built, and the very act of laying stone upon stone is but the counterpart of certain social and intellectual processes which go on simultaneously, creating systems of thought and groups of men to study and to guard them. In many forms the Cause is monumentalised, in habits which custom makes sacred, in books whose ink remains bright when the writer is forgotten, in buildings which last for thousands of years, and above all in that instinct of self-preservation which governs every constituted society of men and which is equally potent whether the terms of union be written in ink or graven on the fleshly tables of the heart. Whosoever forms a society, writes a book, builds a church or a college—that man may be said to commit posterity to much. No generation which inherits these things can be wholly free—unless, indeed, a time should come at last when the virtue of loyalty shall be dead.

The Just Claims of an Institution.

When this process of fixing has advanced a certain way it is obvious that the need for apostles disappears and the call for a settled ministry arises. That is one of the familiar lessons of Church history which needs no rehearsing here. You may make your churches as free as the most liberal can desire, but so long as a church is a church, and so long as it is tenanted by a permanent congregation, it is an Institution having as such certain claims to respect which cannot be set on one side. Whosoever allows himself to be elected as the leader of that congregation cannot be absolved from the duty of maintaining its permanence as a congregation—of doing what in him lies to secure for it a perpetuity of healthy, happy, growing, corporate life. Should his message prove destructive to the life of the organism which in the hope of more life has chosen him its head, how can he, consistent with loyalty, continue to preach that message there? Moreover, he must hold it his duty to engage in labours which have but an indirect reference to the Cause, on the ground that they have a direct bearing on the interests of congregational life. If the interests of the congregation cause him to spend his time in such a manner that he can no longer retain the apostolic character in its purity, then his duty is to acquiesce in the necessity. And that necessity, in more or less stringent degree, he is sure to find laid upon him. It is humanly impossible to fill the part of a modern St. Paul and be ready to answer every one of the thousand claims to which the settled minister is daily exposed. And, gentlemen, so long as we are settled ministers I repeat it is our duty to answer those claims. Loyalty to our congregation requires it of us.

In our Free Churches.

Mr. Jacks then went on to apply these thoughts to the condition of our Free Churches. Freedom, he said, could not prevent their religious wants from taking definite form; while new wants might be created, the old must not be neglected, and a settled ministry was bound to respect and serve the actual needs of the churches. If any man felt the fire of some mighty truth burning in his bones, impelled by an impulse from beyond himself to preach and declare it, but not caring whether his message corresponded to wants already felt, or which the churches could be made to feel, such a man might indeed become a minister and go up and down preaching his word, but he should think twice before he became a settled minister. For such a preacher he believed there was large scope and deep need in the present day. The world waited for preachers to make it feel what in religion was its real want. But the Church, even in its Freedom, knew what it wanted. It was a living organism, and the several parts had come together and grown together for definite purposes; there were inevitable exclusions and preferences, and only those who could sympathise with the exclusions and conform in all honesty to the preferences were justified in becoming settled ministers in that connection. The field of their churches lay within that covered by Truth, Liberty, and Religion, but could not be said to be co-extensive with it. Their churches wanted preaching of the Truth, but had notions of what the Truth is. They wanted preaching of Liberty, but were not quite ignorant of how Liberty should be used. They wanted the preaching of Religion, but in such a form as to meet an existing need. The known wants of the churches were met by settled ministers, the unknown wants of the world by apostles. The distinction was not absolute. The settled minister might be an apostle too, but a man might be an apostle, and do apostolic work, without being a settled minister. The world waited for the religious Reformer, but he should not suppose that the settled ministry of a church was his appropriate field.

The Movement of New Life.

But the cause of Truth, Liberty, and Religion was in the present day, and in large measure a movement of reform. Its direction could only be stated in general terms. The present state of the religious world was like that of the time when Christianity first appeared. A new impulse of the Spirit, of which the origin was Godwards, and the destination manwards, had been born. By that impulse the hearts of men were being moved as the trees of the forest were stirred by the wind. At present it belonged to the world of emotion rather than thought. Within it were combined elements of enthusiasm for righteousness, love and pity for mankind, and awe in presence of Eternal Right and Truth. The ideas that would give it permanence were yet in the making. It seemed to take shape, now as a new theology, now as a new social order. All the churches were profoundly affected, and, to some extent, revived; but in what church it would be most manifest they could not say. Each one, feeling that breath of heaven stirring its inmost life, began to hope the new outflowing might be for itself. But, perhaps, all would be disappointed, and the gift might be not for the churches at all, but for the world. One thing they might add: Whatever institution stood for Truth, Liberty, and Religion would open wide its windows in the hope that the wind of the Spirit might blow that way. To every manifestation of the new impulse a warm welcome would be extended, none the less hearty because the movement was as yet too young and unformed to be attached to any of the existing wants, the fixed tendencies, the known beliefs, the settled ministries of the Religious World. New Life was ever the forerunner of new Truth.

Young Men will Hear the Call.

That outpouring of new life from the Life-giver would be felt first and most deeply by their young men. And it was likely in the future that such might apply for admission to the College, not as wishing to become settled ministers of their churches, noble as that calling might be, but moved to become the organs and interpreters, the ministers to mankind at large of that new life. They would want to be apostles, not ministers in the usual sense. And what reply should be made to them? Should they point to their churches as the only possible sphere of action? Practically they had no other sphere to which to direct the young apostle. And yet they could not be content with such a conclusion. In the cause of Truth, Liberty, and Religion he saw two aspects, the ripe and the unripe. That which was ripe spoke the language of the Gospel and adopted the usages of the Christian Church; it had the bearing and the ideals of a certain type of English Nonconformity; it held fixed ideas concerning the Fatherhood of God, the Leadership of Christ, the Supremacy of Conscience, and the Immortality of Man. It was an articulate answer to an articulate want. It was nourished in their churches, and students who were inspired by those ideas were proper candidates for the settled ministry of these churches. But in the other, the unripe aspect, there were aspirations, impulses, ideals which had outgrown the adopted garbs of thought, as yet too unformed to be described in definite language, but moving in the world, creating profound unrest in the souls of men, stirring the minds of ministers, arousing the spiritual life of young men, and bringing them as students to that College. Though unripe, that element was seething with life. Upwards from the inmost heart of man it was gradually forcing its way towards the organs of articulate speech. Too young to have forms or institutions, it was old enough to have its human organs—preachers, prophets, and apostles.

Too long they had been tied down to the idea that such men could find their only proper sphere of action in the settled ministry of their Free Churches. The time had come to widen their conceptions. It was his sorrowful conviction that the cause of Truth, Liberty and Religion failed to reach the world through the instrumentality of those churches. "The Churches languish; go forth you, and revive them," was indeed the call to a noble and blessed work. But some men, called to be apostles, were not fitted for such work, and instead of reviving, might set the seal upon the death of a Free Church. And he could not think that the noblest-minded and ablest of the young men of the present day would be drawn to that special work. Fired by the larger hopes of the time, burning to do some great work for God and Humanity, what wonder if they hesitated, and finally refused to offer themselves for a position which had such scanty success in making those hopes and faiths of theirs reach the world and tell upon the life of men. He believed there was no lack of young men ready to devote their lives to the cause of Truth, Liberty and Religion; but so long as the settled ministry of their churches was the only field offered, no large proportion of them would be found within the walls of that college.

[The rest of the address we give in full.]

A New Preaching Order.

The conviction has long been growing in my mind, and now, with full deference to the wise men I see around me, I state it publicly for the first time, that, in addition to a settled ministry, our Cause urgently needs the establishment of a Preaching Order, in many respects similar to that which history associates with St. Dominic, untrammelled by ecclesiastical ties of any sort, unhampered by the thousand restrictions which hedge the path of a settled minister, but bound by vows of obedience not less stringent, submissive to a rule of life not less exacting, and inspired by a strenuousness no less high. There is something, as I have tried to show, in the cause of Truth, Liberty, and Religion, which is not always compatible with the conditions of a settled ministry, but is peculiarly fitted to the kind of ministry I have now in mind. Having regard to the youthfulness of the Cause in many of its larger aspects, remembering that these are now at the early stage of inspiration, and far from that of fixed ideas and institutions, it seems to me that through no other means can the torch be carried outside the denominational pale and made to kindle the common life of man.

To be Adequately Trained.

The first step in this direction would be the provision of adequate training. No one believes more heartily than I do in the necessity of that theological learning which this college offers and cultivates. It is a necessity for the settled minister, as he often finds to his cost when he has neglected his opportunity; it would be equally a necessity to that wider type of Apostleship which I am now advocating. But while necessary, no one holds it to be enough. It is not enough, and within the limits of time at our disposal it cannot be made enough. The student must perforce leave his college untrained in many things of which it is highly important he should be master. We must trust to the experience which awaits him to fill up the inevitable gaps in his training. But while this insufficiency is great in regard to the settled minister, it is far greater in regard to what I have in mind. All that this college offers would be but a necessary first step in the training of a preaching order.

To Appeal to the People.

We all have our dreams, and this is one of mine; and though in the telling of our dreams we are often led to speak as fools, bear with me if I run the risk on this occasion. I have dreamt that some day there will come into being a great society, different from this college but perhaps not unconnected with it; different from any body or union which protects or supports our churches, but not superseding them; having a new name which may yet leave old names standing elsewhere; a society whose object shall be to launch into the world by preaching, as it never yet has been launched, the cause of Truth, Liberty, and Religion. At the head of it there shall be some master mind: a man who, like some great general, is capable of thinking in blocks of 10,000 square miles—a man having authority and free to exercise it—and his work shall be to organise a preaching campaign throughout the length and breadth of our land in towns and in villages and in a thousand places where the Cause has never yet been heard. He shall organise that campaign, and to carry it out there shall be under him a cohort of men like-minded with himself; no free lances these, but that nobler type of man which by a powerful effort of will submits to discipline and obeys orders. Do not mistake me. This is not a scheme for providing our vacant pulpits with temporary supplies. It is not a scheme for sending round special preachers to our churches—that would only bring us back to the point from which we start. But in public halls, in theatres, in market-places, at cross roads, trained preachers, fired by the Holy Ghost, but not unskilled in the studied art of persuasion, should be sent to proclaim the Word. I have nothing to say against the professional minister—I am one myself—and believe them to be needed for serving the wants of a settled religious community. But the stamp of the professional minister should not be on these men. They should not have to negotiate for their places, to bargain for their salaries, or to be pitted against rival candidates. They should have nothing to do with those matters of ecclesiastical polity which are involved in the existence of even the freest church. They should be wholly independent of the people to whom they preached. What pay they received—and it should be fixed and uniform for all, not enough to tempt cupidity but good enough to meet reasonable wants—should come from one central source. If among the order there were men of private means, and I believe such men would be found there in greater numbers than among our settled ministry, they would be expected—nay, they would themselves suggest it—to place those means for the time being at the disposal of the common fund.

Practicable or Practical?

I see you smile, and I suppose the words "hopeless impracticability" are rising to your lips. But, gentlemen, I am not telling you what a man would do who puts a price upon himself. I am describing what may be expected of a man whose one supreme interest is the Cause he serves. I believe that our present method of seeking to launch that Cause by the sole means of a settled ministry is inadequate. I think it is already a manifest failure, and therefore I am calling upon my imagination to devise a way of going to work which would be adequate to the magnitude and the extreme difficulty of carrying our Gospel to the great world outside our churches. My suggestions may be far from the best, but if you call me unpractical, I shall answer back. When I go to one of our empty and languishing churches, when I listen to an able, learned man, whose weekly lot is, as I heard it described the other day, "to preach to six adults, four children, and fifty-seven gaslights," I am bound to say that that state of things, characteristic as it is of whole groups of churches, does not strike me as a triumph of practicality. The time has come when it behoves us to summon our inventive faculty, if perchance we may contrive some more effective way of carrying out the religious reformation we have all at heart.

The Training of the Preachers.

Such a Preaching Order would require training, and to train it would be the first business of the society. A period of novitiate extending to one, two or three years would be necessary, and I conceive that such a period would follow naturally upon the studies of this college. From our curriculum much has perforce to be omitted which is of the highest importance in preparing you for your future work. Beset by the claims of other and necessary studies you cannot concentrate on those exercises of soul, mind and body which turns the scholar into the preacher. The utmost that can be done by successive Tate Lecturers may be valuable, but having regard to what is needed it is not much. We trust that you will learn through experience what, for very want of time, we cannot pretend to teach you here. Solvitur ambulando. But I think you will admit that the having so to learn it is apt to postpone the date of our efficient ministry till some time after we have left this college. That date, I contend, would not be further postponed, and there would be no loss of time, but rather a considerable gain, if, instead of plunging at once into the very formidable demands of a fully-fledged ministry, you devoted the next two or three years of your lives to the study of spiritual psychology, to acquiring skill in the noble art of Persuasion, to daily exercise of the voice and body. Nor would I shut you up in a cell to make these studies, but would arrange to have you throughout in close contact with men, especially the poor, in whom you might see both the beauty and the tragedy of life, and so learn the significance of the whole. Best of all, if you would consent by a supreme act of will to lay your own wills aside and submit yourself to external discipline of a far more thorough-going kind than it would be proper here to attempt, practising a strenuous alacrity at the word of command, thereby acquiring those habits of dignified obedience for want of which many of us are so lamentably weak and inefficient.

Attend to the Vision.

I am aware that what has been said may suggest false comparisons, and even lend itself to caricature. To all of which I can only answer, "corruptio optimi pessima." I shall be met with all sorts of difficulties—"How the money is to be found," "Who is to find it?" and so forth. But none of these difficulties will quite persuade me that my dream is foolishness. The ground on which I venture to fling out this seed is good ground, and if the seed contains even the smallest kernel of sound sense we may reasonably hope for some sort of a crop. God forbid that I should come bouncing in with the air of a man who is going to set everybody right. I am not alone in having thought of this. I ask you to weigh the matter in your calmer judgment, and if the thought of to-day points in the right direction then I have you with me in the hope that all the other things will be added unto us.

THE DUTY OF MAN TO THE LOWER ANIMALS.

We have received from Miss Frances Power Cobbe a copy of a letter addressed to the editor of the Christian World, and published on Oct. 3. We are glad to print the letter here also, and to commend it to the earnest attention of our readers.

Sir,—I shall be grateful if you will allow me to appeal through your columns to the clergy of all Protestant Churches to endeavour to give a solution of this problem, which is every day becoming more urgent. So far as I have been able to discover, no serious effort has yet been made by the ministers of reformed religion to deal with this branch of morals as a whole and with the care and gravity it deserves; albeit many of them have eloquently pleaded for mercy to the ill-used brutes. The result of such silence on the Protestant side, is, that the miserable teaching of the Church of Rome on the subject is left in many quarters in possession of the field. That doctrine, as taught authoritatively at Stonyhurst College, is that we owe no moral obligation whatsoever to the lower animals, and that nothing we can do to them constitutes a sin. The words of the Rev. Professor—whose book on "Moral Philosophy" (one of a series having the approval of the Pope) lies before me as I write—are as follows:—

> Brute beasts . . . cannot have any rights . . . They are of the number of things. We have no duties to them—not of justice, . . . not of religion. . . . We have then no duties of charity, nor duties of any kind towards the lower animals.

After arguing that we are at liberty to inflict pain on them for our objects, he adds:—

> Nor are we bound to any anxious care to make this pain as little as may be. ("Moral Philosophy," by Joseph Rickaby, S.J., p. 250. Longmans. 1892.)

Though probably very few Protestants would admit for a moment that these Romish doctrines are true in ethics, yet, having no alternatives to weigh against them, and having received them (more or less confusedly) by tradition from elder and harder generations, they practically act upon them without remorse, when it suits their feelings and convenience. The grossest cruelty to the most sensitive bird or beast—though happily punishable by the law of England for the last eighty years, unless done under licence—is still scarcely regarded by the majority of persons as a real and serious Sin or moral offence (on a par with, if not exceeding in guilt, such transgressions as dishonesty, perjury, drunkenness, and the like), but rather as merely an exhibition of bad taste and low breeding. The proof of this assertion is, that no man is heard in decent society setting forth the advantages to be obtained by lying and swindling as establishing the rectitude of those practices, whereas hundreds of persons at this hour are wont to blazon the (real or supposed) gains acquired by the grossest cruelty to animals with the calm assumption that the cruelty was fully justified by those gains.

The subject is, of course, one of the most difficult in the whole science of ethics, and demands the most careful consideration. On the one hand, we must maintain the right of man to take the life of any animal under certain conditions and safeguards; and, on the other, we are assuredly bound to condemn not only the reckless destruction of happy and harmless animals for sport or fashion, but, above all, the infliction on any sentient creature of such torture as shall be worse than death, and shall transform its whole existence from a blessing to a curse. The "rights" or, rather, claims of animals (I am not concerned to defend the former word, to which a technical sense was given by the old scholastic moralists), however low we place them, must, as their minimum, include exemption from the worst wrong which they can be made to suffer; and to inflict that worst upon one of them (namely, prolonged torture) must involve positive moral offence. In my hearing the best man of his age, the late Lord Shaftesbury, called it an "abominable sin." Between his opinion and that of Father Rickaby there is flat contradiction. Will the ministers of the Protestant Churches come forward and support, with clear and careful reasoning, the opinion of that righteous-minded man, or leave the lessons of the Rickabys to bear their fruit? All over the world at this hour the hearts of men and women are directed with new interest and tenderness to our humble fellow-lodgers upon earth. The doctrine of Bishop Butler that on the simple fact of a creature being sentient of pain, rests our obligation to spare it pain, is receiving an answer of adhesion and agreement unknown to our fathers. If we may presume to use such language, I should say (in view of what I know of such movement in Europe and America) that God is teaching a fresh Divine lesson of pity and tenderness in thousands of human hearts; and that Christ's Law of Love is receiving an extension no less important than when, a century ago, the inferior races of mankind were seen to be included therein. It is only needed that the ministers of religion should give utterance to this new sense of Duty to Animals, and place it in a rational and just form before their hearers, to effect a beneficent revolution in the conditions of the beautiful and kindly creatures around us; and beyond them, and through mercy and justice to them, to train men to gentleness and pity and sympathy for all the weak of our own human race.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

Frances Power Cobbe.

NOTES FROM CANADA.

For some weeks I have been thinking I must send a few jottings about matters over here to The Inquirer.

Our harvest is past, our summer is ended, and autumn is here—autumn with its cool, bright, exhilarating days and its brilliant foliage everywhere, in city and country. Canada has had a prosperous season. The soil has brought forth plenteously—the only serious failure being the apple crop. Business of nearly all kinds has been good.

The great Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo, just across the lake from us, has drawn large numbers of visitors from this side. The Glasgow Exposition has attracted much attention, and but for the distance would have been thronged with Canadians. We have an annual Exposition of our own in Toronto.

In common with the rest of the civilised world we here in Toronto and in Canada generally have been greatly stirred and saddened by the tragic death of President McKinley. But the shadow is at last beginning to pass away. We hope the event will teach us all some lessons.

The Millenary Anniversary of the death of King Alfred is attracting considerable attention here and in the States, but the celebrations on this side will be held late in October, which is believed to be the true date of the king's decease, and not in September, as on your side.

Of course the great event to all loyal Canadians just now (and upon nothing does Canada pride herself more than her oyalty) is the coming among us of the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York. Our illustrious visitors have already been in Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa, where they have received the most distinguished attention. Just now they have gone west to Winnipeg and the Pacific Coast. On their return we are to have them in Toronto, when the whole city promises to be ablaze with flags, brilliant illuminations at night, and noisy enough to suit the most enthusiastic.

Toronto is a great educational centre. Our two universities and dozen colleges are just now opening for another year of work, with excellent prospects before them. Dr. Goldwin Smith has just gladdened the hearts of all who love books by a gift of ten thousand dollars to our leading university library.

General religious conditions in Toronto, and in Canada so far as I know, are reasonably encouraging, though a Unitarian cannot but regret that there is less interest in progressive religious thought here than in the States or in England. The Toronto Unitarian Church has been strong; it is not so strong now, on account of certain rather serious disasters that have fallen upon it within the last few years. This autumn it is entering upon its work with increased congregations, an enlarged Sunday-school, and considerable new hope and courage.

I must tell you how much we on this side have rejoiced over the splendid success of your New Century Meetings in May last. We have read with deep interest the very full reports which have appeared in The Inquirer and the Christian Life, besides the less extended accounts in the Christian Register, and the echoes that have gotten into other papers. We are awaiting eagerly the official report in book form. Surely you must all share with us the feeling that you made no mistake in putting forth the effort necessary to create so remarkable a series of meetings. Of their effects in England, of course, I cannot speak; but I can see clear traces of their influence on this side of the ocean, not only in increasing the courage of our churches and workers, but in changing the tone in which various secular and religious papers speak of Unitarians. One provincial weekly, which in the past has been among the most ready to give the impression that our movement was a mere passing cloud which would soon be gone, has, since the Boston meeting of a year ago last May, and the London meeting of last May, taken pains to say that probably the strength and vitality of the Unitarian Church has been underestimated, and that the signs are that it is a force which the future must reckon with. So the words for us all to pass along the line are Courage! Forward!

I have just returned from the biennial meeting of our National Unitarian Conference which was held last week at Saratoga, N.Y. Your readers may like to have a word about that. The attendance was not quite so large as in some previous years, as, of course, was expected, since the Conference was held in the same state with the great and very attractive Buffalo Exposition, with which nothing can successfully compete so long as it lasts. Still, the Saratoga meeting was a good one. I doubt if at any Conference in our past history there has been a more united or earnest spirit.

The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles E. St. John, the new Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, whose spirit is a deeply religious one, and who is making himself felt as a religious power among our churches wherever he goes. We all regretted that Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, who had been for some years President of the Conference, refused re-election. But his place was filled by the Hon. Carroll D. Wright, of Washington, a man held in equally high honour among us and in the country at large. The address of the Chairman of the Council of the Conference, Rev. Howard N. Brown, of Boston, took the form of a review of the progress of our cause during the past two years, and was distinctly hopeful and assuring. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, and Dr. Charles G. Ames, of Boston, spoke on "A Retrospect and a Prospect," with much interest and spiritual power. There were papers and addresses on "The Church at Work" and "The Church at Worship," by several of our younger ministers. Rev. W. C. Gannett spoke on "The Minister's Adjustment to New Conditions." Two sessions were devoted to the discussion of Sociological Problems and their relation to the Church and Religion, with valuable addresses by Professor Giddings and Clarke, of Columbia University, New York; Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, of New York; Dr. Edward Cummings, of Boston; Miss Jane Addams, of Chicago, and others. There were well attended and spirited afternoon meetings in the interest of the Women's Alliance, the Unitarian Temperance Society, the Sunday-school Society and the Young People's Religious Union.

Perhaps the Conference rose to its highest on Wednesday morning, when two addresses on "The Gospel for the Twentieth Century" were given by Dr. Minot J. Savage, of New York, and Dr. Ecob, of Philadelphia. Dr. Savage was at his best, which means that he gave a powerful and uplifting utterance. I am sorry he has not been heard oftener in England. The difficulty in getting him over there has arisen from the fact that for several years he has not been in good health. It is gratifying to be able to say that he reports himself as entering upon his work this fall with much increased vigour. Dr. Ecob is a new man among us, though for many years he has held a high place among the Presbyterians and Congregationalists. He came to us a year and a-half ago, and is now settled as the successor of Dr. Joseph May in the pastorate of the First Unitarian Church of Philadelphia. His speech at Saratoga was the first utterance we have had from him at one of our national gatherings, and it fully met the high expectations of those who heard it. With intellectual brilliancy there is united in him fine spiritual insight and deep religious fervour. He will be a strong leader among us, and he will lead in the right direction.

J. T. Sunderland.

Toronto, Canada, Oct. 2, 1901.

There was an error in our report last week as to the proposed renovation of the old chapel at Chorley; £750 is the sum required, and it will be seen from the advertisement this week that only £576 has so far been raised. The congregation earnestly appeal for further donations.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Appeal.

London: Rhyl-street Domestic Mission.—The Rev. W. Wilson writes:—"Might I ask through your columns if someone could present Rhyl-street Domestic Mission with a fairly good second-hand cottage piano, for use in a large room upstairs when the large hall down-stairs, already well provided with organ, grand piano, and harmonium, is being used. We have so much going on during the winter at the Mission that our difficulty is to find accommodation for every meeting. A piano for the large room upstairs would allow many a meeting to be carried on when the large hall was being used at the same time."

Harvest Services.

Last Sunday's Harvest Thanksgiving Services included the following:—Belfast: Mountpottinger.—Preacher, Rev. W. J. Davies. Belfast: York-street.—Preachers, Rev. A. Ashworth, and in the evening the Rev. J. A. Kelly. Ciliau Aeron (Oct. 11).—Preacher, the Rev. L. Williams; collection for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Horwich.—Preachers, morning, the Rev. R. C. Moore; evening, Rev. Wilfred Harris. In the afternoon Mrs. J. P. Thomasson gave an address. London: Islington.—Preacher, the Rev. G. D. Hicks. In the evening Part I. of the "Creation" was admirably rendered by an augmented choir. Malton (Sunday week).—Preacher, the Rev. W. Rodger Smyth. Sacred concert in the afternoon. On the following Monday lecture by the Rev. C. Hargrove on "Alfred the Great." Merthyr Tydfil.—Preacher, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins. In the evening the S.S.A. Festival Service was rendered. Rhydygwin (Oct. 3).—Preacher, the Rev. L. Williams. Shepton Mallet.—Preacher, the Rev. L. T. Badcock. Whitchurch.—Preacher, Rev. W. T. Turland, followed on Wednesday by the first of a series of special week-night services, at which the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, was the preacher.

Ainsworth.—The new-formed debating class met in the reading-room on Oct. 11, the Rev. M. R. Scott in the chair, when Mr. Walter Brooks, the President, gave an address on "Temperance." There was a good attendance, and discussion followed.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The fourth annual school sermons were preached last Sunday in the Richmond-street Unitarian Chapel, by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. Mr. Street is remembered here as delivering one of the pioneer lectures of the movement in 1897, and his visit was eagerly anticipated. He preached morning and evening sermons which deeply impressed and inspired the congregations. In the afternoon a special service of vocal and instrumental music was performed, with an address by the Rev. A. R. Andreae, B.A. At the afternoon services the chapel was crowded. Collections realised £20.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—After about eighteen years of service Mr. H. Napier has resigned the superintendentship of the Sunday-school, and on Monday, Oct. 7, a soirée was held, when a beautiful drawing-room timepiece, enamelled with gold, was presented to Mr. and Mrs. Napier, with warm expressions of regard and gratitude for faithful services. The Rev. W. J. Davies presided. Mr. Davies is giving a series of discourses on the journey to Hungary in which he took part.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—The anniversary of the Sunday-schools and Home Mission was celebrated last Sunday, the Rev. H. Gow, of Leicester, being the special preacher. On Monday evening the annual meeting was held, the chair being taken after tea by Councillor J. S. Nettlefold. Satisfactory reports were presented by Mr. W. B. Kenrick and Miss L. A. Smith on behalf of the schools, and by Mr. W. J. Tranter, the missionary. The Rev. L. P. Jacks, who had to be in Oxford for the opening of the College session, wrote regretting his absence, and expressing a hope that the deficiency in the teaching staff of the schools would be supplied.

Clifton.—A well-attended and successful Congregational At Home and Musical Evening was held at the Redland Park Hall Parlour, on the 11th inst., to open the session of the Literary and Social Union. In the course of a short address, Dr. Warschauer referred to the "long-felt want" of a piano of their own, and appealed for funds, with the result that the bulk of the amount required was subscribed there and then, while the total sum has been made up since. A Men's Club has recently been started in connection with the church, and promises success both in point of numbers and otherwise. The experiment of a monthly week-night service is being made. The attendance at the first service was very encouraging.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—The annual congregational soirée was held in the church hall on Wednesday evening, Oct. 9, when there was an excellent attendance. The chair was taken by Mr. William B. Bowring, who, in his opening address, congratulated Mr. Armstrong on his recovered health, and expressed pleasure in seeing Mrs. Armstrong once more at a congregational soirée, after an interval of sixteen years. He referred in kindly terms to the services of Mr. Morton Barnes, whose engagement as assistant minister was now over, and who had gone up to Manchester College, Oxford, for further training. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong said that he was deeply thankful to find himself once more in comparative health and strength. His successive assistants had rendered him most loyal service, but there was a certain compensating satisfaction in taking the whole work once more into his own hands. He was deeply grateful to the congregation for all their kindness, and now appealed to them for their patience with him in the future. Having spoken of various aspects of their congregational life, the school and other societies, he said they had a most great and sacred cause, well worth their devotion. They must nourish the spirit of true, pure, and free religion, first of all in their own hearts, and then let it flow forth to help and bless the world. The Rev. J. E. Carpenter, who was in Liverpool on the business of the Superannuation Fund, also gave an address.

London : Stepney.—Through the generous kindness of Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, the late Miss Durning Smith, and other friends, College Chapel has been lately renovated, and with the able ministrations of Mr. Percy Ames, F.S.A., the congregation are looking hopefully to the future.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday - School Union.—The annual meeting of the above Union was held in the Memorial Hall, Saturday evening, Oct. 12. After tea, the president, the Rev. George Knight, took the chair, and in the course of his address said that the meetings of the last session had been exceedingly well attended and enthusiastic, the papers read being of high merit. He thought that Sunday-school work was growing more and more important, and the grandest work to which any persons, young or old, could set their hands or give their hearts. His own experience had extended over forty-three years. As far as he could see there was a great deal less home teaching on religious matters now than there was when he was a young man; indeed, there had been a marked decline during the last fifteen years. Was not the inference palpable? They must step in and do the best they can for those children who come into the Sunday-school. He would like to see more fathers and mothers take up positions at the head of classes. Young teachers might be earnest enough, but they necessarily lacked experience. The Secretary and Treasurer presented their reports, the latter announcing a deficit of £3 19s., and saying that a lack of funds was a drag on the work. Mr. T. F. Robinson was elected President for the ensuing year, Mr. Woodhead Treasurer, and Mr. Golland Secretary. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the retiring Treasurer, Mr. Mellor, who had been in office twenty-three years, and also to the retiring President. Miss Marian Pritchard, of London, was the principal speaker, her subject being, "Hints for making Sunday-school Lessons." It was an able and helpful address, in which she showed how the teacher who had just joined our ranks could be helped. "Was it not possible," she asked, "for the minister and teachers in every school to form themselves into a small body of friendly counsellors, so that when a new teacher joined the superintendent might say to him 'Here is a group of counsellors; to which would you like to go for initiation and advice?'" They should then have three months for talking over the question together, as to what should be taught, and also the results of his teaching week by week. Miss Pritchard gave a sample lesson, and showed how in five stages the subject in hand could be treated: First, select your point; second, prepare for the journey; third, lead the way; fourth, reach your point; fifth, compare and associate with familiar things; sixth, mark the spot. If teachers would only try this method for two months, she did not think they would readily give it up. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Miss Pritchard for her admirable address. During the evening the Blackley choir provided music, both vocal and instrumental.

Mossley.—At the jubilee of the Sunday-school connected with the Christian Church on Saturday about 350 people sat down to tea, which was followed by a public meeting. Mr. W. Lawton, who took the chair, gave an interesting sketch of the history of the church since its foundation, on the ejection of Joseph Barker from the Methodist New Connection in 1841. At first they attended their old school, but in 1850 it was necessary to separate. The school had done a great work for general education and religion, having often over 1,000 children on the books. Among those present were the Rev. T. R. Elliott, the minister, Mr. John Gledhill, who was present when the school was opened, and Mr. John Heys, an old scholar.

Portsmouth: High-street.—With the aid of a large map of Europe, Mr. H. Blessley, on Sunday last, at the scholars' monthly meeting in the chapel, traced the recent journeyings of Miss Tagart's Unitarian party across Europe to Transylvania. On Sunday week, at the annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services, addresses were given by Mr. G. Cosens Prior, and the collection in aid of the John Pounds Training Home and Institute for Girls amounted to £3 3s.

Scarborough.—A Young People's Guild was inaugurated in connection with the Westborough congregation on Wednesday, Oct. 9, when an address was given by the Rev. Ottwell Binns, on "Guilds—Their Objects and Methods." The suggestions for "Personal Service" thrown out by the minister were discussed by the members, and it is hoped that very shortly these will take practical shape. The devotional meetings are to be held every fortnight, on Wednesday nights.

Sheffield : Upper Chapel.—On Thursday week a large gathering was held in Channing Hall to welcome the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, formerly of Dowlais, as assistant minister. Mr. A. J. Hobson took the chair, and speeches of welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins were made by the Revs. J. E. Manning, J. Ellis, and W. Stephens; Messrs. Hunt, Laycock, and Moody. The Rev. Iden Payne sent a letter of greeting.

South Shields.—At a demonstration on behalf of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants' Orphan Fund, in the Theatre Royal on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 6, a sermon was preached by Mr. Thomas Paxton, on "Religion and Labour." It is estimated that at least 1,100 people were present.

NEWARK - ON - TRENT FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

We are now glad to announce that through the generous donations of friends throughout the country, inclusive of local contributions (£45), we have realised £100, this, together with a promised grant of £10, brings us to within £15 of the amount of the debt on our Church Building. Nevertheless, we were sanguine of getting a total of £150, which would enable us to carry out much needed improvements in our Organ and Heating apparatus.

We now earnestly appeal for further donations.

E. RATTENBURY HODGES,
Minister of the Church.

MR. EPICTETUS, JUNR., HIS BOOK,
wherein is set forth a
COMMON SENSE PHILOSOPHY FOR THE CONDUCT OF LIFE.

Specially written for unsophisticated and simple-minded Folk; and for those who ignore every form of conventional religion.

A theme for the Twentieth Century, and until the Millennium shall dawn.

By BENJAMIN WALKER.

"There are many good things in this book. Throughout there runs a strong vein of theism, healthy and optimistic."—Christian Life.

"We sympathise to a great extent with the author's dissatisfaction with formal philosophy and conventional religion, and agree that Stoicism properly understood offers a better refuge for the human mind. Mr. Walker's philosophy is not pure stoicism, as it is modified by Christian Theism, and the combination is productive of a cheerful optimism. The author says many sensible things. The book ought to be popular, and we wish it success."—Westminster Review.

UNITARIAN FREE CHURCH, READING.

The want of a SCHOOL-ROOM has long been severely felt. Designs have now been prepared for a room with a class-room attached, built on to the church, at a cost (including land for frontage) of £720. This will be available for Lectures, Meetings, Classes, &c., as well as for more effective Sunday-school teaching. The project is warmly approved by the Provincial Assembly.

It is desired to put the work in hand at once if the necessary support be forthcoming.

The Committee therefore earnestly ask for the help of all who are interested in the religious education of the young.

Twelve Hymns & Their Writers

Biographical Sketches and Lesson Notes.

BY

REV. VALENTINE D. DAVIS, B.A.

Cloth, 1s. net, postage 3d.

The plan of this little book was to select twelve hymns such as it would be good to learn by heart, and by different authors, whose lives would furnish matter for an interesting biographical sketch with some useful lesson in it, while the hymns also should provide material for further lessons.—From Preface.

The Writers treated are:—

MILTON,
KEN,
WATTS,
TENNYSON, WESLEY,
COWPER,
OBERLIN, WHITTIER,
NORMAN MACLEOD,
SAMUEL LONGFELLOW,
ALICE CARY,
JOHN JOHNS.

The British Friend says:—"The sketches of character are delightful from the delicacy and taste with which the author delineates the trend of thought in each of his subjects. The Hymns are brief but well chosen, and well worth remembering for the thoughts they express."

The Christian Life says:—"The idea is excellent. . . . The hymns are not only suitable for children, but will be useful companions in their learner's mind throughout life."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE have received many more letters than it is possible to publish, prompted by last week's replies to Mr. Jupp's plea, "For the Magnanimity of England." But beyond all other questions connected with the South African tragedy in its immediate urgency appears to us that of the children in the concentration camps. We do not wonder that Mr. Arnold Lupton could not refrain, as will be seen from our report, at the meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Leeds, and we could have wished that the feeling on this subject had been so strong among our people as to compel a united expression of opinion from the members of the Association, as part of their regular proceedings.

THE official returns show that since June 1, out of 54,326 children in the concentration camps, 5,209 have died, and that in September alone 1,964 died. In the camps healthily situated in Cape Colony there has been no mortality, and in Natal very little; it is in the Orange River and Transvaal districts that this hideous sacrifice of child-life has been made, and one would think that long ago, and at any cost, the Government, knowing what was taking place, would have seen to the removal of the mothers and their children to the coast. In a letter to The Times the Bishop of Hereford wrote :—

> Of all the bitter and humiliating legacies of this war there will be none so bitter, none so sorely felt hereafter, as the untimely death of all these unhappy children. Moreover, when the Boer exile returns, eager to clasp in his arms the little ones he left, only to find himself a solitary or childless man, is that likely to prove the seed of his future loyalty? It may be different if the children are kept alive to tell him how tenderly and with what loving kindness they were nursed by English men and English women. It is because those who are now working in these camps are doing their best to save, and yet in spite of all death laughs them in the face as he goes on reaping his ghastly harvest month after month, that such camps stand utterly condemned as homes for children. Therefore the hearts of English fathers and mothers on every side are crying to the Government to bestir themselves and make haste in this saving work, for the love of Christ to make haste.

Last Sunday evening the Rev. Gardner Preston, before pronouncing the Benediction, told his congregation at Hastings about the appalling death-rate in the camps, and moved the following resolution, which was unanimously passed :—

> That we, the men and women forming the congregation of the Hastings Free Christian Church, respectfully beg to call the attention of the Most Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury to the appalling number of deaths of men, women, and especially little children, in some of the concentration camps in South Africa, and humbly beseech him for pity's sake to use his vast influence and power to put an end to this most awful tragedy, which is staining so deeply the honour of the nation over whose destinies he presides.

Is not this a matter on which all Christian churches and all true patriots should at once make their voices heard?

THE Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association addressed a letter of sympathy to the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association, on the occasion of the death of President McKinley. The following reply has been received by Mr. Bowie :—"I was much indebted to you for your kind and courteous letter regarding our national grief and crisis. This has been a significant national experience, and all of us who believe in democratic principles can take great satisfaction in the strength and steadfastness of spirit which our people have displayed. In the first moments of righteous indignation there was a natural outburst of wrath against the wretched assassin, but it was closely followed by a clear and universal recognition of the fact that law is supreme and that all passion must be held severely in check. Our people are naturally sensitive and quick in expression, and the deep quietness of spirit with which we have passed through this crisis is a gratifying evidence of the new maturity and self-mastery in our national life. This event has also had immense influence in uniting the different sections of our people. A common anxiety and a common grief have filled the heart and mind of the nation, and deepened the sense of mutual interest and responsibility. We may all cherish a new confidence in the stability and reserve of democratic institutions."

IN acknowledging a copy of the volume containing the proceedings of the International Council, Dr. Eliot writes to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie :—

"I have been reading with great interest the excellent little book which you have made out of the papers given at the International Council. It is an amazingly good lot of addresses. The spirit is so broad and catholic, the intellectual standard so high, the real brotherhood so evident, that the book is vastly encouraging. You have done a capital piece of bookmaking, and I hope that the book can have a wide circulation. I hope your organised work feels the impulse of the International Council. Our work goes forward without event, but with quiet and steady strengthening of the roots. In nothing, however, do I take more satisfaction than in the fact that I had some part in the organisation of our International Council. I am sure that that will prove a vigorous and increasingly fruitful organisation, and it has been a great personal pleasure to me to come into contact with trusted friends and fellow-workers in other lands."

THE Bicentenary of the Old Meeting House at Ipswich was marked by a thorough renovation of that historic building, at a cost of over £1,000, but there is still some necessary work to be done, and particularly for the proper heating of the chapel. To this end, and at the same time to clear off a remaining debt of £143, the congregation are anxious to raise £250, but feel that, after the generous response at the time of the Bicentenary, they cannot again appeal to their friends for donations. Their minister, therefore, the Rev. Lucking Tavener, offers lectures, either with or without illustrations, on well-known artists, on Italy, Sicily, London, and some literary subjects, and would be glad in this way to earn some guineas for the Bicentenary Fund. Particulars may be obtained from Mr. Tavener, or from the Wardens of the Old Meeting House, in Friar-street, Ipswich.

MR. W. H. SHRUBSOLE, F.G.S., whose record of the recent Unitarian Pilgrimage to Transylvania our readers will remember, has now completed an illustrated lecture on "Hungary and its People," which those who know Mr. Shrubsole as a lecturer will have confidence in recommending to churches and societies on the look out for such an evening's entertainment. The lecturer's address will be found advertised in another column.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

MEETING IN BELFAST.

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 18, a special meeting of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians was held in the Central Hall, Belfast, to receive a deputation consisting of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter and Mr. J. Cogan Conway, who attended on behalf of the Ministers' Superannuation Scheme.

The Chair was occupied by Rev. M. S. Dunbar, M.A., ex-President, and there was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen from the neighbouring congregations. Among the latter were:—Messrs. John Rogers, J. R. Miniss, J.P., (Dromore), J. Davidson (Windsor), J. Davidson (Knock), Bowman Malcolm, C.E., Lowrie Martin, J. Hunter (Antrim), W. J. Baxter (Dromore), J. Greenfield, C. Gordon; Revs. J. Kennedy (Hon. Secretary), J. A. Kelly (Hon. Treasurer), W. Napier, John Miskimmin, R. J. Orr, W. Fielding, A. Ashworth, W. S. Smith, Douglas Walmsley, R. M. King, S. H. Mellone, Alfred Davison, T. Dunkerley, J. H. Bibby, C. Thrift, W. Weatherall, J. Gearey, F. Thomas, A. Turner, J. Hall, T. W. Scott, R. Lyttle, W. J. Davies, G. J. Slipper, and W. H. Drummond.

The Chairman, in fitting terms, introduced the Rev. J. E. Carpenter and Mr. J. Cogan Conway to the meeting, and these gentlemen proceeded to explain and advocate the Ministers' Superannuation Scheme in a clear and telling manner. It was then moved by Mr. John Rogers, seconded by Mr. J. R. Miniss, J.P., and unanimously resolved—

That this Association begs to offer its hearty thanks to the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter and Mr. J. Cogan Conway for their addresses, and at the same time express approval of the National Conference Scheme for Ministers' Superannuation; and its resolve to promote the financial interests of the Fund among the churches of the Association.

Messrs. J. Davidson (Knock), J. Davidson (Windsor), and Revs. R. J. Orr, D. Walmsley, T. Dunkerley, and J. Kennedy, having spoken, it was further unanimously resolved, on the motion of the Rev. W. H. Drummond, seconded by Rev. J. A. Kelly—

That it be an instruction to the General Purposes Committee to take, at an early date, the necessary steps to have the object of this resolution realised, and to deal with the matter as may seem most expedient.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

The Council met at Oxford on Oct. 15. The Secretary reported: — (1) That Leaflet I. setting forth "the Guild idea" had been sent to all the churches on the roll of the Conference; (2) that Guilds had been recently formed at Scarborough, Willert-street—Manchester, Essex Church—London, and Carlisle, and that meetings were arranged at Banks-street, Blackpool, and other places with a view to organisation; (3) that requests had been numerous for copies of the "Manual of Services and Prayers for Guild Meetings," and that the Guild Manual had already been adopted at Scarborough, Middlesboro', Upperthorpe, Essex Church, Birmingham—Old Meeting, Warrington, Leeds—Mill Hill; (4) that Guilds at the following places had joined the Union—Chowbent, Warrington, Liverpool—Hope-street, Leicester—Great Meeting, Stepney, Willert-street, Kidderminster, Birmingham—Old Meeting, Upperthorpe, and several others had promised to do so.

The Council decided to issue a "Guilds' Year Book," which shall contain "An Account of the Methods and Work of the Guilds in the Union," "Hints for the Formation and Work of Guilds," "Helps for Bible Study," "Topics for Guild Meetings," and "Golden Sayings for Each Day of the Month."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SOUTH-EASTERN PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

Sir,—It is generally recognised that no one has a better right to chide our churches and societies for their sluggishness than those veteran comrades who, like Mr. I. M. Wade, have fought the good fight during many years. If our dear old friend's criticisms in your last week's issue, welcome as a sign of his continued vigour and faithful remembrance, stimulate us to more effective activity, they will be doubly welcome. I think, however, those who attended the service and meetings at Essex Church can assure him that earnest aspirations and mutual incitements to a deeper religious enthusiasm were more abundant than he has gathered from the newspaper reports.

As to the records of failure, which he particularly alludes to, in attempts to found new churches, Mr. Wade appears to suggest that the Committee over which I had the honour to preside during the last two years contributed to the failure by withholding grants-in-aid. It is a fact, however, that not only was the Committee of 1897-8 fully convinced of the hopelessness of trying to establish churches at the places referred to under existing conditions (see Annual Report, 1898, p.6), but the Executive of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, after prolonged experience and special inquiry, came to the same conclusion. On the other hand, it is a fact that private generosity did all that mere money could in the circumstances. It would be obviously impertinent for me to criticise the prudence of such single-hearted benevolence; but what individuals may do within the ample range of personal responsibility and private judgment, those who have the charge of public funds may not do without incurring censure. Of course, no good fighter likes to see the abandonment of even the most forlorn of hopes; but if we see a position to be clearly untenable, it is our duty to the commonweal not to waste our scanty forces there.

With regard to our friend's remarks on the "nondescript" character of the "theological faith" of the Assembly, and the avoidance of references to Unitarianism (which, perhaps, was not so marked as the reports have led him to suppose), I have nothing to say except this:—Whether "non-subscription" and the missionary spirit have much in common, or not, there has never been any hiding of the "Unitarian name" or doctrine at Bermondsey, for example, during the history of the Fort-road Church; so that the weakened state of that congregation—now kept alive solely by the Assembly— is certainly not due to indefiniteness of theological propaganda. The problem of winning the people, there and elsewhere, to habits of worship and religious culture is not so easily solved; it presses heavily upon many, and so heavily that it is unjust that they should be told they "lack spiritual zeal or purpose."

May I, in conclusion, invite suggestions from interested friends towards forming plans for religious work in Bermondsey and similar areas of population? The subject of "Our Duty to London" will, I believe, be discussed at the autumnal meeting of the London District Unitarian Society next month, and it ought to prove fruitful. But, meanwhile, we are very anxious to settle something for the immediate task in hand. W. G. Tarrant.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

Sir,—Your readers will notice in the Report which I was able to present to the Council of the Guilds' Union, held at Oxford last week, and which appears in another column, evidence that our advocacy of "the Guild Idea" is receiving the attention it deserves.

I have received numerous letters from all parts of the country asking for copies of the "Manual," for fuller information as to organisation, &c., and intimating that Guilds are in contemplation or in process of formation in many of our churches.

I shall feel obliged if ministers and secretaries will inform me as soon as organisation has been effected, so that the "Record of Guilds and Kindred Societies" in our churches, which will appear in the "Guilds' Year-Book," shortly to be published, may be complete.

The work of uniting the young people into a religious fellowship for work and worship is, admittedly of the highest importance, and should receive careful consideration at this season when plans are being laid for the winter activities.

Members of the Council are desirous of assist in every way possible, either by correspondence, or attending preliminary or inaugural meetings. John Ellis,

Hon. Sec., National Conference, Guilds' Union.

WESLEYANS AND EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT.

Sir,—The interesting statements in the communication of your Birmingham Correspondent have no bearing whatever upon the passage in my paper—"Any Wesleyan minister who publicly denied the dogma of everlasting punishment would be unfrocked and excommunicated." I shall be glad to have sufficient evidence that I am in error as to the action of Conference in such a case.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, Oct. 19.

FOR THE MAGNANIMITY OF ENGLAND.

Sir,—Many of the readers of Mr. Jupp's letter, though dissenting entirely from the general views of your Nottingham correspondents, must have felt, as they did, that there was an apparent flaw in the case as Mr. Jupp put it—the assumption, namely, that we are in the position of conquerors in South Africa.

This, however, does not settle the question of whether an exercise of magnanimity is demanded from the British people. Magnanimity is a virtue that can be exercised by either disputant at any stage of a dispute. Magnanimity may be needed to avoid an unjust quarrel, to enter with dignity into a just one, or to sustain a noble cause nobly. It may be needed to purify and cleanse from bitterness the feelings of both combatants during the contest, and of victor and vanquished alike at its close. At no point of the struggle can it be relinquished without inflicting deadly injury on the delinquent which no defeat or external humiliation could impose. And above all it needs magnanimity to acknowledge an error, to retrace a false step, or (if our cause was originally a righteous one, but has become overladen and entangled with unforeseen consequences) to admit that the original justice of our position has ceased to justify the measures into which we have been insensibly drawn in vindicating it.

Moreover, it requires magnanimity to credit (not only in our words, but in our hearts) those whose action appears to us to be pusillanimous, with a desire equal to our own to discover and to adopt the magnanimous course; to believe that some at least of those who support action which appears to us ignoble have a sense of honour and a chivalry no less sensitive than our own. So much magnanimity as this is manifestly required as a condition of a fruitful interchange of thought in your columns on the subject to which you have opened them.

It may need the sternest self-command to speak of these matters in words, and think of them in words that imply no denunciation of others; but no man who quails before the test has a right to demand magnanimity from those who differ from him. He may denounce, but he cannot attempt to convince. The very attitude of his mind towards those he would influence is his own proclamation that he can see no nobility in them to which to appeal. To urge upon them the claims of magnanimity would be to contradict himself.

How, then, may we hope that the magnanimity of those from whom we differ should be manifested in ways intelligible to us? And, specifically, how may those of us who regard the British cause in South Africa as the cause of oppression, hope that those who regard it as the cause of righteousness may convince us of the sincerity of their desire to show magnanimity; before they have achieved victory, or even when victory is doubtful?

To me light came on this question from the most unexpected quarter. A weighty, it seemed to me, in some respects, a noble, communication appeared in the Daily Mail one day last week. The writer regarded the destruction of the farms, the sweeping of women and children into the refuge camps, and the shooting and hanging of rebel leaders, as deplorable and miserable substitutes for an efficient army. He maintained that if we had had a proper system of recruiting, and if we had properly repaired the waste of our army, all these things would have been unnecessary, and we should have been able to carry the war through, probably (as I understood him), at greater expense, but without degrading our methods. He seemed to think that it was not yet too late to do what should have been done from the first. The truth of his main contention seems to be borne out by Sir Alfred Milner's assertion, as recently reported in the daily papers, that the concentration camps were instituted purely as a military measure, and also by Lord Roberts's declaration to Botha, that if he did not surrender we should be driven to methods which would—not crush his army, but—ruin his country.

Mr. Dowson is one who never advocates even the worst cause without manifesting (or, at any rate, allowing us to see) qualities of heart and mind which would grace the best, and to men of his temper I would make this appeal:—

The cause which justifies in your eyes the suppression of two free Republics must be a holy cause indeed. It is impossible to prevent unhallowed hands from touching the ark of God. It is impossible to exclude the ribald and the rapacious from the ranks of the crusading host. But it is possible that the enthusiasm that inspires and the heroism that sustains a great cause should imprint itself on the control and direction of the instruments with which it works. Insufficient military strength is only another name for want of self-sacrifice and devotion on the part of those who believe in the righteousness of England's cause. How does our account stand, if it is this lack of devotion which is responsible for the desolated homes and the dying children in South Africa—for the hanging and shooting of brave men who have been captured on the field of battle? With the full sense upon us of the awful responsibility that now rests on this nation, dare we say that the country that champions justice on these terms is in no danger of committing deeper treachery than if she had never drawn her sword, or had sheathed it when she found herself shrinking from the full price demanded of her?

Philip H. Wicksteed.

P.S.—I am unwilling to introduce matters of detail into the general discussion of principles, but Mr. Dowson is not the only one of us who noted Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's declaration that we had offered to the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony a position identical with that enjoyed by the French Canadians. Can Mr. Dowson or any other of your readers point out when, how, and to whom we offered these terms, and tell us whether they are still open?

Sir Michael's assertion took many of us by surprise. One would suppose from its form that it rested on publicly known facts. If so, what are they? If not, must not Sir Michael give us more precise details before he or his supporters can expect us to give its proper place (whatever it may appear to us to be) to so weighty a consideration as the offer and rejection of these terms?

Sir,—It is evident from the correspondence in your columns this week, which I for one have read with great pain, that the earnest and temperate appeal of Mr. Jupp is without avail in some sections of religious life, where one would have supposed that appeals to "magnanimity" would have found an answering chord. Quite apart from the immediate question of the War, the letters of Mr. Dowson and Mr. Simon indicate a strange mental atmosphere to a member of our free religious community.

A spiritual descendant of English Presbyterians adopts the policy and the very language of Strafford and Alva: a member of a priestless Church divides the functions of clergy and laymen, the former "to make the world what it should be," the latter "to deal with facts of the world as they are."

One imagines that "the world as it is" would be a much worse place to live in had not some laymen, at least, refused to accept such a stifling creed as that.

You will not wish me to enter at any length into the numerous controversial questions raised by these letters. What can one write when between each issue of The Inquirer over sixty little children's lives are offered up as sacrifice to the policy of "Thorough" in South Africa.

Two or three things must be said. I beg you to grant me space to say them as briefly as possible.

The "magnanimity," or the prudent statesmanship, of Mr. Gladstone (for the "magnanimity" of giving back with limitations what had been previously stolen without excuse in 1877 was not very apparent), did at least give peace to South Africa for fourteen years. The present statesmen have not been able to see ahead for fourteen months, not even fourteen weeks. We are told not to forget the Boer Ultimatum. We are not likely to do so, but we shall remember at the same time the repeated refusals of arbitration, asked for by the Boers, refused by our Government at least four times in the course of the negotiations before the War. We shall remember the refusal by Mr. Chamberlain, on Aug. 28, of the terms as regards franchise asked for in May by Lord Milner—a refusal explained as a refusal in despatches Sept. 8 and Sept. 22 before the War—declared in Parliament, Oct. 19, after war had broken out, as an acceptance of nine-tenths of the whole. We shall remember Lord Wolseley's suggestion to subjugate the Republics (remember, both Republics) in June, 1899—see Lord Lansdowne's speech in the House of Lords—declined because the Government "wished to have the country with them; they were not ready for war in June or July." We shall remember the incitements to war published daily in the London Press during those fateful three months. We shall remember the promise to "formulate our own proposals" never fulfilled, the hurrying forward of troops, the calling together of Parliament, and the reserves.

All these we shall think of as happening before the Ultimatum of President Kruger and President Steyn, and the invasion of Natal.

Mr. Dowson quotes Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who stated that the Boers still in the field had been offered the position which French Canadians enjoy under the Empire. When? There is no record of it in the official correspondence. Surely Sir Michael and Mr. Dowson do not refer to the terms Lord Kitchener was instructed to offer to General Botha in March of this year?

Let me briefly recapitulate them as regards the constitutional point:—"A Governor (Lord Milner) and Executive Council, consisting of a certain number of official members, to whom a nominated unofficial element will be added. It is the desire of the Government, as soon as circumstances permit, ultimately to concede to the Colonies the privilege of self-government."

Why, Sir, if such terms were proposed to either French or British Canadians they would be in rebellion to-morrow, with Sir Wilfred Laurier as their leader, and some sympathisers in Nottingham.

But why, Sir, discuss questions of pride and blame, and as to which side was most wrong, while the camps (combatant and concentration) offer up their monthly holocausts, and those who differ from our Government politically are executed without legal trial. We are looking on at the massacre of a whole people. Not, it is true, accomplished in a few days or weeks, as some of the out-standing barbarities of history have been, but in its relentless cruelty, and "thorough" inhumanity, week by week, month by month, exterminating a population for their love of self-government, and a free land.

Richard Robinson.

Sir,—I regret to find in the correspondence in your last issue another recourse to the unhappy plea that the war was inevitable. It has always seemed to me that this plea, so far as it is anything but an ex post facto defence of what cannot otherwise be justified, is a sad confession of failure. Granting, what I am not prepared to admit, that the Boers were so disposed towards the English that they had determined upon war at the first suitable opportunity, there follows the question—what must have been our conduct towards them in the past which had produced such a state of mind? How comes it that we have lived side by side with them for so many years with so lamentable a result? Either we must conclude that the Boers are absolutely incapable of appreciating fair treatment and good will on the part of their neighbours, which is indeed to draw an indictment against a whole people, or that there have been grave faults on our part. When we recollect such incidents as that of the Kimberley diamond mines and the Jameson raid, with the popular glorification of its criminal heroes, can we honestly fall back on the first alternative? And if the inevitability has arisen largely out of our own conduct in the past, what sort of a defence or excuse does it constitute for our action in the present?

Few, I imagine, will be found to deny that this war is a terrible evil arising out of the passions and antipathies of two so-called Christian peoples. To say that such an evil is inevitable is to pronounce the severest condemnation upon those peoples, and, at the same time, to put forward past bad conduct as an excuse for present wrong.

We shall not be able permanently to conceal from ourselves the fact that sin, national and personal, is at the root of this evil. Against such sin and evil it must surely be the duty of all—who recognise it—even though (pace your correspondent) they be ministers of religion, to raise their clear and definite protest.

Surely there has rarely been a clearer case of the genesis of evil out of unrepented sin, and of fresh sin and evil again from that.

Beginning with the lust for wealth, we see developed the growing influence of finance upon politics. From that sprang the Raid, and from that and its practical condonation in this country the increased suspicion and the great armament of the Boers. These led to demands in clear contravention of our treaty obligations, and these to the fatal issue of war, arousing new passions which found expression in the demand for "unconditional surrender" and the denial of "a shred of independence." That policy has led by a necessary logic to the devastation of the country and the horrors of the concentration camps. Who can say what will be the next development of this awful evil?

I am not contending that the Boers have no share in the sin of which all these horrors are the fruit. Theirs have been the vices of ignorance, of obstinacy, and suspicion deepening into hatred. It may be added that some among them have been treacherous, though most have proved themselves to be honourable and gallant foes; and that some have been corrupt; but here let us pause to ask who were the corrupters. Let the Boers answer to God for their own share of the evil, as we must assuredly answer to Him for ours.

These considerations lead me to doubt whether Mr. Jupp's plea is quite the right one to make. The way out of this frightful entanglement lies not along the lofty heights of magnanimity. To those heights a great man led us once, and we have proved ourselves incapable of living there. The way lies rather through the valley of humiliation and repentance. Only there can we get at the root of this hideous evil, and hope to check its monstrous growth.

Humiliation is upon us already in the failure of our policy to attain the ends at which it aims, and in the terrible circumstances which it has entailed. Repentance may follow when we cease to delude ourselves with talking about the inevitable, and with repentance may come light which will enable us to find a better way.

THE PROTESTANTENBOND OF HOLLAND.

We announced last week that the Rev. R. A. Armstrong is to represent the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the annual meetings of the Dutch Protestantenbond, to be held at Utrecht on the 29th and 30th of this month; and in view of the interest of those meetings, we are glad to be able to offer to our readers the following notes from the annual report to be then presented.

The Protentantenbond, like the B. and F.U.A., is an association of individuals, not of churches. Its members, who are nonsubscribing liberals in religion, are fortunate in being able to call themselves by the unambiguous name of "modern." The division into modern and orthodox runs through all the Protestant sects; therefore the fact that a man belongs to the Dutch Reformed Church, for instance, is no indication as to whether he is liberal or conservative in his theology. Hence an association of "modern" congregations would be scarcely possible, because there might be many congregations where only a minority of the members are "modern." The Protestantenbond is intended to bring into fellowship all the "moderns" of the country, whether in their own locality they be few or many. If there are a large number in one place, they are formed into a branch (Afdeeling) of the Bond, with a local committee and officers. If there are only a few, they have no local organisation, except that one of their number acts as correspondent with the Secretary of the Bond. Such a group is called a "Correspondency (Correspondentschap)." There are, besides, a few isolated members.

The report before us states that the number of branches is 157, one less than in the preceding year. There are 18 correspondencies, and 68 isolated members. The total number of members of the Bond is 18,500, almost exactly the same as in the preceding year. The total would be somewhat greater if the community at Grand Rapids, Michigan, were included. But the connection between that society and the Bond has become so slight, that the Committee of the latter have thought it best to take the name of the American Branch off their list.

It is the duty of the various branches to provide for public worship and religious instruction, on "modern" lines, so far as their means will allow, and in general to do what they can to make known the principles of free religious thought. The report shows that there is a wide range of efficiency amongst the various branches, some being strong and full of work, some being content with a modest programme, and some doing nothing at all. The report, in its first paragraph, fires off a sharp rebuke at thirty-three branches who have neglected to make any return of their membership and condition, and have thereby sorely tried the patience of a long-suffering secretary. Then is given a long list of branches where the membership has declined, the numbers being stated, followed by another list more cheerful though not so long, of branches where the membership has increased. Various details are given of the condition and work of the several branches; and we notice here the same tendency as in the paragraphs dealing with the membership of the branches—namely, to give prominence to the least satisfactory items. The effect is somewhat to depress the reader, though no doubt there are good reasons for this arrangement. Take it altogether, the report is the description of an average year's work, in which slight gains and losses about balance each other. There can be no doubt, however, that whatever may be the shortcomings of some of the branches in regard to zeal and efficiency, the general work of the Bond is carried on by a splendid body of helpers, well equipped with resource and enthusiasm, and the steady faith that makes goodness win. Some of their efforts succeed and some fail; but they do not cease to make efforts, to try new methods, to improve small beginnings, and in general to keep before their fellow-members, by example even more than by precept, the ideal of helping to bring nearer the Kingdom of Heaven. To give details of the work would be of little interest, as it relates to unfamiliar names and places. We can, however, take up our own task with renewed energy, knowing that our brethren in Holland are working for the same ideals, and that the work is prospering in their hands.

EARLY NONCONFORMIST EDUCATION.

Professor Foster Watson has written a study of "The Education of the Early Nonconformists" for the September number of the Gentleman's Magazine, which is well worth consideration. Mr. Watson, as many of us know, is Professor of Education at Aberystwyth College, and is recognised both here and in the United States as one of the leading authorities upon the History of Education in England. He writes as an educationalist, and is absolutely free from any of the spirit of the partisan. The testimony of such a man to the important influence which early Nonconformist education exerted on English life is both interesting and weighty. "The history of the education of these early Nonconformists," he says, "persecuted and despised as they were by scornful and self-satisfied contemporaries, would be the finest record of education, outside of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, to be found in England. It is not improbable that in the eighteenth century their academies afforded an education superior to the contemporary Universities—superior if not in book learning, at any rate in the culture of the finer virtues of life." The article dwells much on "The Historical Account of my own Life," by Edmund Calamy, 1671-1731, and finds in that life many indications of the characteristics of Nonconformist education. They loved learning with a patient eager love, but they would not sacrifice their principles to gain it at the Universities where subscription to the Anglican Creeds was necessary. They were quietly true to their own thought, and established schools where secular and theological learning could go hand in hand. But there was no bitterness against the Anglican Church; rather indeed, there was an ineradicable admiration and love for it in spite of the persecution which they endured at its hand.

Speaking of Frankland, the founder of Rathmel Academy, he describes how he was driven by implacable persecution to transfer "his academy first to Natland, near Kendal; thence to Dawsonfield, in Westmoreland; thence to Halburrow, in Lancashire; thence to Calton, in Craven, Yorkshire; thence to Attercliff, near Sheffield; finally back again to Rathmel. The good man's life was a pilgrimage indeed, in external changes as well as in the inward temper of his mind; and the students as well as the tutor were disciples of the cross. Scarcely a year elapsed, from 1685 to his death, in which he did not suffer trouble for keeping an academy and training up young men for the dissenting ministry." And yet with all their strength of conviction these early Nonconformists kept the tolerant sympathetic spirit in their schools and in their lives. "In matters of difference among professing Christians I had moderation instilled into me from my very cradle," says Calamy. "Never did I hear my father inveigh against those that officiated in the public churches, nor did he attempt to create in me any prejudices against them or their way; but he took all occasions that offered to declare against heat and rancour on all sides, and for loving all such as were truly pious and bore the image of God upon them, whatsoever their particular sentiments might be." Calamy himself went to Oxford for a time, not having made up his mind against the Anglican Church. "I was a witness," he says, "of her learning, wealth, and splendour. I heard their sermons, and frequently attended their lectures and academical exercises. I was free in conversation as opportunity offered, and was often argued with about consorting with such an unsociable sort of people as the Nonconformists were represented."

Calamy was deeply in earnest in his search for truth; he read the Early Fathers, Chillingworth Hooker, Jeremy Taylor and others, and in the end he declared for Nonconformity and left the University. "I at the same time resolved," he says, "that I would ever study the things that made for peace and do all that in me lay to promote a catholic spirit and brotherly love, and avoid, as much as I was able, narrowness, bitterness, wrath, clamour and evil-speaking. Thus doing, I thought I could never be justly charged with that uncharitableness and disaffection which passes in Scripture under the name of schism.

The chief characteristic of Nonconformist education is felt by Professor Watson to lie in the fact that "it was not merely a liberal education of the old grammar-school type—founded upon a severe course in the reading of classical authors, &c.—but an education which, in the end, brought the man to an eager desire for theological truth, and a willingness to take untold pains in its investigation, together with a spirit of charity which could bless and wish God-speed to those who differed from him in opinion, as long as he believed that those differing from him were sincere and right-hearted."

That is, indeed, a description of a high ideal of education. It is easy enough to find schools where secular learning is well taught with or without a little formal religious instruction which usually leaves the heart and intellect of the boys untouched. It is comparatively easy to find schools where a definite strong theological bias—usually Anglican—is imparted. But the schools are not numerous of which Prof. Watson's description is even partially true, schools where secular learning is well taught and where also the love of truth is inculcated and some clear simple teaching of religion and all this "in a spirit of charity which could bless and wish god-speed to those who differ in opinion." This, says Professor Watson speaking with the authority of one who knows, was the spirit of the best early Nonconformist academies. Mr. Barker, in establishing the foundation of Willaston school at Nantwich, must have had some such ideal in mind. With those early Nonconformists it was not only an ideal but an achievement and one which has left enduring marks in English life. "This position," says Professor Watson, "of attempting to understand points of view different from one's own seems to us to mark a new era in theological education and in education generally. . . . The growth of sympathy combined with knowledge in the academies is undoubtedly connected historically with the finest spirit of the modern demand for freedom of thought in all matters of speculative inquiry." Professor Watson's article is one to be grateful for, not only as a historical study recalling to our minds ancestors of whom we may well be proud, for it bears directly on our present-day needs and difficulties. The ideals of these early Nonconformists ought in essentials to be our own, and what they succeeded in doing under stress of many persecutions, we in our more prosperous and happier circumstances need surely not shrink from attempting.

UNITARIANISM EXPLAINED IN THE RUSSIAN LANGUAGE.

There has recently been issued from the press at Christchurch, Hants, a booklet, in paper covers, containing a translation into Russian of three pamphlets—"A Brief Account of Unitarianism," by Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D.; "Unitarian Christianity Explained," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A.; "Unitarian Christianity," by W. E. Channing, D.D. Mr. Tchertkoff has contributed a Preface in Russian, which he has kindly translated, from which we quote the following passages:—"The articles which form the contents of this booklet having been translated from English, are published at the expense of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Unitarians intentionally avoid establishing any official definition of their religious views, being convinced that all compulsory dogmas and fixed creeds only serve as an obstacle to the further growth of religion. Therefore the views herein expounded should be regarded as an expression of the personal opinions of their individual authors. It is true that the majority of contemporary Unitarians probably agree with these views, but some of the more rationalistic representatives of the Unitarian movement take up a yet broader attitude towards these questions. Those readers who find views which may not seem to them sufficiently radical need not, because of this, regard themselves as alienated from Unitarianism which always seeks the greatest possible degree of enlightenment, and is capable of profiting by the co-operation of every sincere and serious thinker.

"On the other hand, for those who have only just begun to free themselves from current superstitious theology, the ideas here expressed, though at first they may appear too radical, will prove most useful. As we know in Russia, owing to the restrictions of the censor, we are unfortunately completely bereft of literature which deals with religious problems in a free spirit, whereas writings of the purely materialistic school enjoy a wide circulation amongst educated readers. Consequently, those who have cause to doubt the reliability of Church doctrines and are in search of a more rational religion—not finding in Russian literature any help in this direction—either blindly rush into dogmatic atheism, or else in despair, clutch the narrow church theology, on the plea that it is impossible to harmonise reason with religion.

"But there exist people, and their number is increasing, who refuse to be satisfied with the senselessness of church doctrine, or with that absence of all higher meaning in life, to which materialistic atheism inevitably leads. These people seek and cannot attain peace, until they find that reasoned foundation of their existence which is given by religion alone —true religion, liberated from all that is arbitrary and superstitious. For such readers literature belonging to the category of the present series of publications may have an important significance in that critical period, often so agonising, of doubt and searching, when, being unable to rest on the servile subordination to external authority, they, with the aid of their own reason and conscience, are endeavouring to discover the meaning and the destination of life."

THE RETURN TO TOWN.

BY THE REV. CHARLES PEACH.*

Exodus iii.

Something of the seer remains in all of us, and there come times when we turn away from the pursuits of town life with an unsatisfied longing in our hearts. We see through the illusion of power and the delusion of mastery, and we own the loneliness of a life from which Nature is far removed. Our souls hunger for the thorn bushes aflame with the glory of God's presence, for the calm and the purity of the meadows, the freedom and the far vistas of the moors.

Sorely throb my feet, a-tramping London highways,
(Ah! the springy moss upon a northern moor!)
Through the endless streets, the gloomy squares and bye ways,
Homeless in the city, poor among the poor!

London streets are gold—ah, give me leaves a-glinting
Midst grey dykes and hedges in the autumn sun!
London water's wine, poured out for all unstinting—
God! For the little brooks that tumble as they run!

Then when we take our jangled souls and tired bodies out into the quiet of some old hamlet, the stillness all around, the grand calm, the wonder of a world grown suddenly silent and still falls upon our souls, and we can understand how the shepherd youth felt that he must draw off his shoes for the place on which he stood was holy ground.

Nor is it less holy ground to us to-day. For as the strength of the hills becomes new power in our bodies and the calm of Nature lays its benediction upon our souls we know that God has been there, walking with us still in the cool of the evening. There is new life in the soul, there is fresh vigour in the body, there has been a clearing of the mind. What does it mean? Who can explain God's wonderful alchemy which transmutes the glory of a setting sun into undying life and faith in a human soul, and makes the breeze on a wind-swept moor a minister of healing to a broken human frame? We are of one piece, we men and this wonderful world; parts of one complete whole. And there is one life breathing through all, and that is the life of God. It is the flame of the divine presence when the thorn bush bursts out into its glory of flower, and it is the flame of His presence when a human life flowers into heroic strength and unselfish love; it is His voice which speaks in the song of the stream whose music is made by its obedience to law, and it is His voice which sounds in the cries of human souls buoyed up by hope and love in the stress of life's toil. I do not wonder that the old seer drew off his shoes; the only wonder is that we are so little moved, or that conventionalism is so strong with us we fear to express the emotions which the divine in Nature quickens in the divine within us.

Now with frankly reluctant feet we turn away from the country and come back to our places in the town; leaving the country as Nature lays her golden crown on trees and bushes—her reward for faithful service—shedding in autumn's dying splendour such a wonder of colour on the hillside as if from the Elysian fields whose gates had been opened to welcome in their new spring which we call our dead summer.

We need not be ashamed to acknowledge the reluctance of our return.

God made the country: man made the town.

It is not from the toil and the exhaustion of work that we shrink. Many of us work harder during holidays than during working days. Exacting and physically exhausting tasks have a charm for healthy minds, which the touch of danger, added in mountaineering, changes into a perfect fascination. It is a haunting sense of littleness, incompleteness, almost unworthiness, in what we can do as we compare it with the completeness and calm of Nature which makes us reluctant to return. As we look forward and see how the feverish anxieties of the town will fasten upon us, Nature seems to smile almost cynically—seems to say: "So hot, little sir!" It all seems so little, so poor, this part of ours, so fretted with our littleness—deformed to the measure of our narrowness—that we would, if we could, live for ever away from it and up above it.

Ah! that is the pathetic delusion which has haunted men's souls in all ages. The delusion that they could change the conditions of life by removal to some other place—the delusion that they could rise above the littleness of self by mere physical elevation. It is that delusion which drives men and women into the seclusion of religious retreats—it is that delusion which leads them to fly from the haunts of their fellows, to live in distant and lonely places—it is that delusion which makes many of us reluctant to turn our feet citywards again. For it is a delusion. Life is in the soul first—there or nowhere. If there were no chord in our souls Nature could awaken no music in us. And we bear our life about with us and it makes Heaven or hell for us of our surroundings. There is no cell from which we can shut it out, no mountain which it will not climb with us.

It is the strangeness and the contrast to our ordinary life which we find in the country which silences lower desires and wakens better life in us for a season. Alas! would it not grow common in time? Would not the miracle of life pass us by and leave us unmoved? Some have found it so in the anguish of their souls. The glory has faded, their souls have grown cold, they have wondered why they remain gazing into empty skies.

The reluctance of our return is not strange or unworthy. Indeed, it is better so; a thousand times better that we should return reluctantly—leaving unwillingly a Glory which has not yet faded away and a Presence not yet dissolved into the mere light of common day. For coming thus we bring the vision still living in our souls.

And in its strength, through after days,
We travel our appointed ways.

It is the familiar which so soon becomes the commonplace that we shrink from in our return to the towns. Life's education moves slowly and the process seems to us monotonous.

It is that that we are reluctant to take up, as it is the newer and unexhausted experience of the country that we are reluctant to lay down. For, although I sometimes think it ought to be easier to live a good life in the country than in the town, while I am sure that many of us would lead a healthier, if not a happier, life there, yet I must confess that there is no sorrow or sin in the town which could not be matched in the country. Lives are wrecked and hearts break in cottages whose gables blaze with summer roses, and the problems of wealth and want, of work and wages, are felt in the hamlet as well as in the city. Indeed, I feel a more acute sense of discord when I dip beneath the surface and find the wrongs to Nature and to man which flourish unsuspected in some seemingly happy village, for it all seems so wanton, so deliberate, so wicked. Here in a big city one feels that it is all part of the cost of education—part of the price which has to be paid for all progress. We are here in the hands of vast social forces which we cannot yet control; it is to us still all artificial, not yet Nature. But in the country it is so different, or, rather, it would seem so, for we must never lay on fate the fault of character, and, whether in town or country, man is still man, and there is our grand master problem.

And we in the towns are not unrelated to the country. We may not serve at the altar of life as does the man who scatters the seed and reaps the grain, but we have to hand round the bread and the wine. The problem of distribution; of the world's want or satisfaction, is not solved in the villages. God never fails in his part; the harvest is sent; the husbandman does not fail in his part; the harvest is garnered; it is the mighty task of the towns which has so far baffled all our ingenuity—the problem of distribution—the problem of the use of the gifts which God and man co-operating pour out in the universal harvest year by year.

It is to our part in that task that we return, touched with an added sense of sacredness in it, drawn for our communion with Nature. We are in the place where God needs men and good service, and any sense of littleness or unworthiness in our task is derived from our own souls, not the task itself. Great souls lift their tasks by the nobleness of the spirit in which they undertake them, and our part in humanity's task is one which should call forth the best powers of the best men. We have so to construct and re-construct our towns—so to organise and fulfil their mission that, although Cowper's lines may still be repeated, there shall yet come a day when the touch of God on man will be so close and felt so soon that though God made the country and man made the towns, yet in their moral and social architecture our towns shall show that they were made by men who were God's children.

ON THE THOUSANDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF KING ALFRED THE GREAT.

The chords that bind a people heart to heart
Link also age to age:
To touch of kindred pain responsive still,
Back through a thousand years they thrill,
And with the Past unite its living heritage.

The clouds of Time dispart!
Lo, through the rift
See *Winton's hallowed pile its walls uplift!
Mist-like they yield them to the fixèd sight.
And underneath their pillared shade
(Look, ere the fleeting vision fade,)
Our Saxon forefathers with holy rite
Surround the bier whereon their King is laid.

Hail, Sires, in sorrow met!
The infinite regret
That drains the manhood from your heavy eyes
Your sons have learnt full bitterly to share.
The noble tree that bare
The King ye mourn,
Drawing fresh sap from many a royal source,
Like gracious fruit for us hath also borne—
A Queen, who, unto honoured ripeness grown,
Hath likewise fallen: wherefore in sad discourse,
Heart unto heart, deep unto deep doth moan.

Alfred, Victoria, your praise is one!
Like as an evening gone
Fades the millennium that held ye twain:
The countless accidents of age and state
Fall off: together ye are great.

And hence we see again
That they who thread Ambition's weary maze
Know not at all how simple are the ways
That lead to lasting fame;
Even the same
That all the thronèd saints of Heaven have trod—
To live for others in the fear of God.

E. M. G.

With regard to the work of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, last year's President, replies this week to our old friend, Mr. I. M. Wade. We have also a letter from Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, of Reading, agreeing that as to the attempts at sea-side resorts "he is a wise general who knows when to retreat," but then pointedly remarking that at Reading the congregation is alive and is actively engaged in building a school-room, for which help is required. Towards the cost the congregation has contributed £250, and generous donations have been received, but not yet enough.

OBITUARY.

MR. A. H. WANSEY.

By the death of Mr. Arthur H. Wansey, at the age of seventy-four, which occurred on the 18th of this month at his residence, Sambourne, Sneyd Park, near Bristol, Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, loses one of its founders and most attached members, Bristol one of its best-known and honoured citizens, and the cause of religious liberalism in the West of England a prominent pillar. Born at Warminster of an old Unitarian family, Mr. Wansey came to Bristol early in life; he was admitted as a solicitor in 1850, and was appointed Registrar of the Tolzey Court, of which he was also Deputy Judge, in 1860. By taste and temperament he refrained from taking active part in public or municipal life, and devoted himself with assiduity to the duties of his profession. He was a past president of the Bristol Incorporated Law Society, and was always highly respected by the members of the profession, as well as by all with whom he was brought into contact. Possessed of great charm of manner, of abundant kindliness and sympathy, he had for many years been closely connected with the Montague-street Domestic Mission, which mourns in him its President, and whose well-being he had deeply at heart. Of Oakfield-road Church he was, as already observed, one of the most consistent and generous supporters, and its fortunes engaged his interest to the last; indeed, nothing but the burden of growing ill-health ever kept him from attending divine worship with the congregation which he had helped to plant in Clifton. It may, perhaps, be mentioned as a particularly touching circumstance that in his will Mr. Wansey declares his thankfulness for the simple Unitarian faith in which he had been brought up, and which to the end seemed to him the faith which Christ wished his followers to possess. With him there disappears a singularly gracious personality, a figure of rare lovableness and sterling sincerity of purpose, regretted by men of every shade of religious and political opinion; one who in his day and generation had helped to make Unitarianism synonymous with civic and domestic virtue, with wise and enlightened philanthropy, with strict and honourable integrity. A Memorial Service was held at Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, on Sunday morning, Oct. 20, the Rev. Dr. Warschauer giving expression to the sense of personal loss sustained by every member in the congregation.

To Correspondents. — Letters, &c., received from the following:—J. W. B.; F. E. C.; G. V. C.; R. C.; R. M. C.; F. W. D.; C. A. G.; J. G.; A. H.; W. H. H.; R. H. K.; C. C. L.; J. M. M.; S. H. M.; H. N.; T. P.; E. M. R.; F. A. S.; G. F. S.; L. J.; F. W.; J. C. W.

'Tis nobleness to serve;
Help them who cannot help again;
Beware from right to swerve.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Her Ideal.

It was her ideal, though she never knew it. She would not have understood you if you had talked to her of such a thing as an ideal.

She was only a poor little forlorn child playing with many others equally forlorn, round the statue of a girl in the market-place of a great city. Many, many times had she played there without once looking at the statue or thinking about it. Never once had she wondered who put it there, or why. To her that market-place was the greatest place in all the world. It was there, day after day, she took all the pleasure she could get out of life; leaving her dirty squalid home, and miserable surroundings, to meet her companions and play.

One day she paused in her play, and looked up. She gave the statue girl a startled look. She fancied the stony eyes looked reproachfully at her own dirty unkempt figure. How clean and tidy the figure looked, how smooth her hair; how straight her frock sat round her; her stockings and shoes how neat! The girl held her breath, while a thrill of excitement passed through her. Why should she not be like the statue girl? Down went her hands to her stockings which hung loosely over her ragged boots. She pulled them up with a jerk, and then back went her hands to the tangled fringe that framed her face; she smoothed back her hair, and then paused just one moment to think, to feel the bliss of a new sensation, a dawning of possibilities within herself that she had never dreamed of before.

The next day she came with clean face and hair combed. Again she gazed at the statue, and saw something new to imitate. Another day saw her with frock patched and darned, shoes and stockings tidy. Her own appearance surprised her; she became more and more like the statue; she was quieter. Once she thought she could not be enjoying herself if she was not making a great noise in her play. She found it was not so; she was happier now she was transformed. Every time she passed the statue she looked lovingly, reverently at it. She thought even the stone girl had noticed the change, and approved. The eyes looked less coldly at her; she fancied sometimes they smiled at her.

She grew dissatisfied with her surroundings; she almost despaired of improving her home; but she tried, and succeeded. Her ambition caught on, her brothers and sisters began to imitate; even the poor tired mother was roused, and brought fresh energy to her work. Who can say where that child's influence ended?

It was a strange Ideal. Never would the sculptor dream that his bit of chiselled stone would affect the lives of so many people in that way.

Are you someone's Ideal? Is there a little child somewhere copying you—imitating your evil deeds as well as your good ones? You would be startled if you thought it was so; yet it may be. Think about this when you are tempted to do something that is not right. A. W.

"LAWS OF LIFE AFTER THE MIND OF CHRIST."

"He who ministers here is no priest of any altar made with hands, but a prophet of Him who is a Spirit, and communes with those whose worship is in spirit and in truth. And if they are yet but a scattered host, it will not be always so. It needs but voices of the Spirit, like that which bears its witness here, to wake response from every side, and wider and wider spread the spiritual family of God."

So wrote Dr. Martineau in the Memorial Preface which he contributed to the volume of Mr. Thom's sermons, "A Spiritual Faith," published in 1895, sermons gathered after their author's death from his remaining manuscripts, to be taken, as Dr. Martineau said, as leading up to the culminating excellence of the "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ."

That these sermons have wakened response on many sides, and often in unexpected places, no one acquainted with the deeper currents of the religious life of this country during the last twenty years will deny. The first volume was published originally in 1883, the second in 1886, and now it is with the utmost satisfaction and gratitude that we welcome a new and cheaper edition of both volumes,* which must extend to a far wider circle of readers the knowledge of a teacher who ranks with Martineau among the chief of modern seers of things spiritual and interpreters of the mind of Christ.

Mr. Thom has been called an "abstract" preacher, and his sermons "essay-like." Indeed, in the December number of Temple Bar, 1894, the year of his death, Miss Mary Cholmondeley, author of "Diana Tempest," published an article of very warm appreciation, with the title, "A Latter-day Prophet," speaking of Mr. Thom as "possibly one of the greatest teachers of our age," but in her study of the "Laws of Life" speaking of the two volumes simply as "books of essays." If such a description should have led any to turn to these books who under no provocation would open a volume of sermons, we could not regret it, and they, if they had any sense of the earnestness of life, would not regret it. But sermons they certainly are, and among the noblest of their kind. "As these books were written," says Miss Cholmondeley, "in stillness and in quiet, so should they be read. They demand from the reader some of that concentrated attention and reflection, some of that sincerity of purpose, of which they themselves are the outcome. For they stand as the outward and visible sign of the labour, the culture, the aspiration, of a pure and steadfast nature, whose eyes have explored every cranny of the human heart, and have treasured every glimpse vouchsafed to the pure in heart of Him in whom we live and move and have our being."

As to the character of these sermons, we will quote the following passage from some reminiscences contributed by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers to a memorial article on Mr. Thom, which appeared in the Liverpool Unitarian Annual of 1895 :—

> You ask me about his preaching thirty years ago. I have never known anything like it. I think the great secret of its power was that "he preached not himself." Singularly free from any kind of personal or local allusion, from any element of consideration for the special circumstances of himself or of others, it might be thought very abstract—it looks so on the printed pages of his sermons. It was abstract as all true poetry is, belonging to all men and all times; and speaking for them, as well as to them. As to the manner of it, it was marvellous how the preacher threaded his way through those long and intricate sentences—written on small note paper, in his fine thin hand, lines close together, and (what is so perplexing to the reader), with perpetual hyphens, of which nobody can tell beforehand whether they introduce amplifications, or antitheses, or parentheses; but he never stumbled or lost his place. And the effect—when you heard it, you knew that there was a Word, sharply piercing as a two-edged sword, dividing the joints and marrow. We used to laugh at a story told of a certain man who gave up attending Renshaw-street Chapel, and alleged as his reason, that the morality taught by Mr. Thom was impracticably high. The basis of fact at the bottom of the story is obvious. I cannot conceive of any preaching that turns so exclusively on the highest sanctions of life and conduct as Mr. Thom's. All the things of earth are regarded sub specie aeternitatis. All duties spring from a spiritual Noblesse oblige. "To walk worthy of God" is no longer a far off consideration, but "very near us, even in our hearts"; our "high calling in Jesus Christ" is the true vocation of man.

To this we will add a passage from an article which appeared in the Liverpool Daily Post, of October 9, 1894, from the pen of the Rev. L. P. Jacks, who was the occupant of Mr. Thom's pulpit at the time of his death :—

> The immediate environment in which John Hamilton Thom fulfilled his task was the religious body known as Unitarian. But in a deeper sense he belongs to the whole Christian world. His published writings convey the simple utterance of a man of God. As such they will long survive their author, and long continue to touch the deepest springs of human life. If, as some say, Time has a secret for sifting out and preserving the true grain of human speech, then surely the work of this man is a permanent addition to the spiritual treasury of the race. Published sermons belong to the most ephemeral class of literature, and, as published, they are not infrequently an obvious mistake. But the sermons of Mr. Thom form a lasting storehouse of the bread of life. They are the expression of a soul manifestly impelled to utterance by the power of the Spirit. In the happier future, when the differences between Christians are rated at their proper worth, readers of these sermons will forget to ask of what complexion was their author's creed. They will think of him only as one born in the highest rank of souls, quickened by the consciousness of God, trained by communion with the spirit of Christ, and sublimely confident of the inner truth of the message given him to deliver.

The appearance of this new edition of the "Laws of Life" affords a great opportunity to our people, if only they will realise its significance, of doing a piece of missionary work of the very highest kind. These two volumes are now issued at a third of the original price, yet in the same most readable form as the first edition. They contain teaching, in beauty and spiritual power to be compared only with such masterwork as we have in Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life" and "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," and, as some readers and lovers of both teachers judge, going even more directly to the very springs of life, searching the depths of the heart, quickening the noblest aspiration. Wherever there are hungry souls, seekers after truth and a larger measure of Christ's spirit, yearning for more of the true life with God, let these sermons find their way. Here is a touch-stone that will discover what is best in each heart, and awaken that divine unrest, which can be satisfied only when all evil is purged away and life is brought into communion with the Highest. See to it, especially, that no minister is without these books, and we will venture to say, that, if they are earnestly read, a new discipline of the inward life will do its quiet work and a new power of grace and truth will make itself felt in the pulpits of the land.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AUTUMN MEETING.

The autumn meeting of the Association was held at Leeds on Monday and Tuesday, with which was combined for the first time a meeting of the Sunday School Association. There was a full attendance, and the cordial hospitality of the minister and congregation of Mill Hill Chapel was warmly appreciated. The chill of the autumn fog outside only served by contrast to heighten the pleasure of the gatherings within doors.

THE SERVICE.

On Monday afternoon service was held in Mill Hill Chapel, conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, the sermon being preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. There was a large congregation, and a helpful service was enriched by the choir's beautiful rendering of the anthem, which opened with the choral—

Sleepers awake! a voice is calling

Awake! His kingdom is at hand,
Go forth to meet your Lord—

followed by a duet, "Now are we ambassadors in the name of Christ, God beseeches you by us," and the exquisite chorus, "How lovely are the messengers that preach us the gospel of peace." Mr. Dowson took for his text 1 Cor. xii. 13, "In one spirit we were all baptised into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free, and were all made to drink of one spirit." He recalled the great gathering in London on the Thursday morning in Whit-week, when the foreign delegates were welcomed to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in the hall that was once Theophilus Lindsey's chapel. On that occasion, so full of enthusiasm and the fervour of religious gladness, they felt as never before borne along in a mighty current of religious sympathy, and realised that their little band of churches were homes of a spirit that was become world-wide, and that in their apparent isolation and the day of small things, they were in spiritual union with men and women all round the globe, seekers of truth and of God, like themselves, speaking their religious language, thinking their thought, looking, as they did, for the coming of the Kingdom of God. Then they realised as never before what a splendid thing it was to join in such a gathering of kindred spirits, what new strength and courage and joy was gained by looking brethren of like thought and faith in the face.

They knew before their close kinship with their American brethren, but Dr. Crothers, with prophetic speech and the look of Channing in his face, had touched a deep chord and wakened a quick response, as he spoke of the Universal Church of God and Man. And as speaker followed speaker the feeling deepened, with no discordant note, and the meeting made for a true catholicity. There was one spirit of love to God and man, and whether under the Unitarian name or not, in Protestant or Catholic countries, the avowal of a free way of access for the soul to God, and that it was life and not doctrine which opened the gate of heaven. Very striking in illustration of their brotherhood was the speech of Tchertkoff, the friend of Tolstoy, the prophet and apostle of a life of Christian simplicity, excommunicated by his Church, but very near to the spirit of his Master. And the Hindu Theist, speaking for the Brahmo Somaj, was of the same glorious company. Under the clear skies of East Anglia he had that summer looked up night after night to the star-lit heavens, filled with a sense of the Divine Majesty and the littleness of man and his tiny globe, and yet felt the glory of living and breathing in so grand a universe under the law of Infinite Wisdom and Goodness. The thought of other souls in closer union with God in that infinity of worlds must bring them to their knees in speechless worship and make them hate all narrow aims and destroy conceit in their own wisdom; and yet that glory was added to their life, that they had part in the grandeur of the whole, as children of the great Spirit living and moving in the universe.

So he had felt in the narrower arena of their Church life in Whit-week. In the world-wide fellowship of human souls they might feel smaller than ever themselves, yet great in their work, with a cause wide as humanity, shut in by no sectarian bounds. From such an experience they must gain fresh inspiration for their work. Those meetings had killed whatever remnants of the sectarian spirit he had left. They must forget themselves in the greater cause, thankful for its triumphs by whatever hands it was achieved. Their part was in the religion of emancipated souls throughout the world, in communion with the living God, in fellowship with Jesus. They must care only to speed on the cause of God's truth.

THE EVENING MEETING.

After tea in the Priestley Hall, which was filled to overflowing, so that numbers had to wait for a second sitting-down, a public meeting was held in the Albert Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., in the absence of Sir James Kitson, Bart., who was to have presided, but wrote to say he was prevented by medical orders from fulfilling any evening engagements at present, and regretting that he could not join in welcoming the Association to Leeds. The Chairman was supported by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. (President of the B. and F.U.A.), Lady O'Hagan (President of the S.S.A.), Mrs. Blake Odgers, Mrs. Collins Odgers, Miss O'Hagan, Miss M. Pritchard, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., the Revs. C. Hargrove, H. E. Dowson, D. Agate, F. Allen, W. G. Cadman, A. Chalmers, B. C. Constable, J. Ellis, T. W. Freckelton, E. Ceredig Jones, J. Collins Odgers, C. Roper, J. E. Stronge, C. H. Wellbeloved, J. H. Wicksteed, J. J. Wright, and W. Copeland Bowie (Secretary of the B. and F.U.A.); Messrs. Oswald Nettlefold (Treasurer), W. Colfox, W. Long, John Harrison, Ion Pritchard, Harrop White, Hartley Wicksteed, W. D. Cliff, A. C. Briggs, and E. Basil Lupton. Many other ministers and laymen from different parts of the country were also among the audience, cities as far apart as Exeter and Newcastle-on-Tyne being represented.

The Chairman, on behalf of the Mill Hill congregation, offered a very cordial welcome to the Association to Leeds, and their thanks to Mr. Dowson for his sermon. They were greatly indebted to the Association for its work, done in a spirit so broad and catholic, to which they very largely owed the unity which now prevailed among them. They had a reasonable faith, but it must lead them to a yet greater work. They did not feel the horrors of war as they ought, and they were faced by the dreadful evils of drink and gambling. If Government could not exercise more control over those evils, they must work against them through individual faithfulness, feeling their personal responsibility and remembering Christ's commands of love to God and man. If Unitarians would take the lead in those things they would do an even greater work in the new century than they had done in the past.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., as President of the B. and F.U.A., acknowledged the welcome extended to them, and the abundant hospitality of their friends. Their Association was not a Presbytery, with power over any congregation or minister, and had no desire to interfere between minister and congregation; nor had they any desire to build up a sect that should last for ever. They were a voluntary society of individuals, pledged to promote the principles of Unitarian Christianity. It was true that at present they were in a minority, and their preacher that afternoon had spoken of them as pawns. Well, if he remembered rightly, pawns in the game were always in the front rank, and though they could not move very fast they went straight forward. Bishops, it was true, could move faster, but they went slant-wise, and if pawns kept going on far enough they became at last queens! And for themselves, was there not work enough, if only they would go straight forward? They had great advantages over other churches, as witness the fate of Dr. Mivart in the Roman Church, when he ventured fearlessly to seek the truth, and the silence with which Bishop Welldon's declaration as to the limits of authority was received by the Church Congress. At that Congress it had been declared that in pure theology there could be no new doctrine; but they as Unitarians were always seeking a widening knowledge of God's truth. They put up no walls, declaring that within their enclosure every truth necessary to salvation must be found, but were glad to receive light from every source, and looked with hope to the future.

Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, as Treasurer, made a humorous and forcible appeal on behalf of the funds of the Association. Among the great questions, religious and social, with which they were occupied, the question of £ s. d. might seem to be a little pigmy; but it had to be attended to. And lately his little pigmy had not been very well, but had been losing weight. He hoped that in that bracing Yorkshire air he might gain a stone or two. For the last few years the subscription list had been going down, from natural causes; and he must continue to harp on an old string, the trouble was that the young men did not step forward to take the places that were left vacant. They had a great work to do in supporting their churches at home, in the publication of helpful literature, and in sustaining liberal religious movements abroad. To maintain it they must have sufficient funds.

The Rev. C. Roper, President of the Manchester District Association, said that he hated sectarianism, but felt that to secure the progress of their work they must openly avow their Unitarianism and use that name. He believed it had greatly helped their work at Moss Side, that from the first they had called their church a Unitarian Church. On the other hand, he had seen in the paper a report that Lady O'Hagan had opened the Bazaar at the Bury Presbyterian Chapel. They, of course, knew what that chapel was, but the public did not; and that did not help their work. As Unitarians they had brought light into the world of thought, and now they must go out tothe people, and discover new and more popular methods by which to gather them in. Every church that helped to establish a new church would be the stronger for the effort.

Lady O'Hagan spoke on "Unitarianism as a Religion for Young People." The young intellect, she said, required guidance, and only as their churches became educational centres in the highest sense, and ready to relinquish antiquated customs, would they really attract the young. There was too much conservatism in their churches and hankering after old forms and conventional custom. In the new century they had to face a great development of scientific knowledge, a great increase in the knowledge of the past history of mankind and of the social and religious development of the race; but, on the other hand, a revival of sentiment and sentimentality in the churches, and of the ecclesiastical conception of limiting, if not prohibiting, personal investigation in matters of spiritual life and theology. Only by keeping such facts in mind could they arrive at a practical conclusion as to the best method for teaching the young. In the Sunday-school the child must find a properly co-ordinated system of instruction; and in the teaching there must be nothing spasmodic or uncertain, nothing unprepared or ill-considered. She had recently been greatly struck in France by the perfect system of religious instruction used by the dominant church of that country, with the ablest teachers always chosen to direct the instruction. She had often wished that their young ministers, on first leaving College, with the glamour of the school still upon them, might devote one or two years to the work of the Sunday-school, helping and directing the teachers in the best way.

The Rev. C. Hargrove said that in the past century Unitarianism had proved to be a religion for strong men and women, of formed character, but not for the young of unformed mind, of whom generation by generation they had suffered loss. Any religion to be a power in the world must offer both reason and feeling, appealing both to mind and heart. Unitarianism had never been deficient in mind; but they would not attach the young by reason and the truth of doctrine alone, they must appeal also to feeling, to their hearts. And to this end he had great hope in the method of their Guilds, which associated the young together in religious union, demanding no profession of religious faith, but uniting them as servants of God and man, and members of a congregation. He earnestly commended that method to ministers and congregations.

Sir John Brunner, speaking on the subject of Education, asked, in the old-fashioned phrase, whether in that matter they were convinced of sin? Were they doing their duty for the cause? Giving a great deal of time to the subject of the improvement of education, he found everywhere Unitarians engaged in the same work. Frustrate your intellect was a phrase he used constantly to hear from an old preacher in his youth, but they who believed that the best of all they had must be given to the service of God and man were persuaded that they must brighten, polish, and strengthen the intellect of the country. With intellect he included reverence and imagination, and they must all be developed as fully as was possible. As they wished to do to others as they would be done by, they must give the people elementary education free and unsectarian, giving equality of opportunity to all. They must give the children instruction suited to their circumstances present and prospective. Until a few years ago the aim of their education seemed to be to make all the boys third-class commercial clerks, but now he was thankful to say there was a better spirit abroad. The children must be taught to understand the work they would have to do. Turning from elementary education, he advocated the multiplication of Universities. Where there were many Universities, they saw the countries advancing; where only a few, they stood still. If they spent twenty millions on establishing Universities, in twenty years the money would be returned to them ten times over. As a patriot he wanted the influence of England to spread as it had done in the past. So they must help in the spread of education and improve its quality, and it would be as great a benefit to the world as any they had conferred in the past.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie desired to call attention to the very grave educational crisis through which the country was passing. If liberal educationalists did not awake to the gravity of the situation, those who were interested in perpetuating sectarian schools, with their friends in power, would succeed in wresting from them a great part of what had been gained in the past. They must insist on equality of opportunity for every child, and what was no less vital, equality of opportunity for every teacher. Tests had been swept away from the Universities; they had still to be swept away from the training colleges for teachers. To secure just conditions effective control must be placed in the hands of the people. No question was of more importance not only for trade and commerce, but for the upbuilding of character. They must all do their duty to secure those ends.

Miss Marian Pritchard spoke on "Indifference and Materialism," as serious evils which they must set themselves seriously to conquer. Their present condition was like the interval between two pictures on a screen, where the clear lines of one were all blurred and the fresh picture not yet dictinctly focussed. In the past the picture of their religious thought had been sharply defined, and it was not very beautiful, at least it left much to be desired; but there was no room then for indifference in the presence of the fires of hell. That picture had now passed. People had outgrown that house of their soul and were building a better habitation; but many seemed to have exhausted their energy in pulling down, and without help were likely to end their days in the Slough of Despond. They were out of the guardianship of the nurse of tradition, but had yet to learn the responsibility of self-government. One great lesson to be learned was of the simple law that cause will produce effect—simple indeed, but how far-reaching, how full of warning and hope. "A young man must sow his wild oats," it was said. But if so, then he could not reap the harvest of golden grain. There again there was no place for indifferentism. Everything mattered. They must preach that they were all members of one body. Another picture was ready for the screen, but they must focus it, and all give of their best strength towards that end.

The Revs. Dendy Agate and T. W. Freckelton also made helpful speeches on the same subject, the former quoting Professor Clifford's saying as a true word for the present time, not "let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," but "let us take hands and help, for this day we are alive together"; and the latter urging that it was not enough to preach against indifference or even to work against it; they must live against it, and Christ-like lives, side by side.

Mr. John Harrison proposed, and Mr. Harrop White seconded, a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and the benediction, pronounced by the Rev. A. Chalmers, brought the meeting to a close.

Afterwards, Mr. Arnold Lupton, who had asked in vain for an opportunity during the meeting, on the ground that the programme was quite full, took possession of the empty platform, and proposed the following resolution:—

That this meeting considers that the Government statistics of the South African camps of refuge prove that the condition of the South African camps is revolting in the extreme, and that every sentiment of humanity and every dictate of honour demand that the British Government should at once give orders to remedy the hideous condition of the camps.

This was seconded by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, of Padiham, and carried with three dissentients by those remaining in the hall.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Tuesday morning a conference was held in the Priestley Hall, a short devotional service being first conducted by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones.

The chair was taken by the President, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and as the Rev. J. E. Manning was not able to arrive for the beginning of the meeting the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie took the first place and read his paper on "Achievements and Opportunities."

The paper opened with a vigorous plea for practical religious work under the Unitarian name as alone practicable for our purpose. As Unitarians they desired to offer men Religion—the truest, noblest, purest, most effective religion that had found its way into their minds and hearts and lives, and which they would share with all who would partake of it. Many other forces were making for liberalism, but they who thought on that account that their work as Unitarians was done were living in a fool's paradise. There were storm-tossed minds and sin-stained souls needing the uplifting and purifying gospel they had to preach; there were thousands of hungry human hearts who would rejoice to know of the Gospel of God's transcendent, all-embracing truth and love, as declared by Unitarian teachers such as Channing and Parker, Martineau and Thom. Their association was a missionary organisation which existed to give practical expression to those principles and ideals. The measure of its work was only limited by the support it received. He then proceeded to sketch the work of the Association, through its special preachers and lecturers, such as Mr. Stopford Brooke and Mr. Carpenter, its publications, such as the new and cheap edition of Thom's "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," and its support of churches, while its foreign work was also helpful and far-reaching.

In conclusion, Mr. Bowie spoke of our newspapers as follows:—There is one other matter upon which I wish to speak a word. It is on a topic apart from my general theme, yet touching it, too, on all sides. It is a subject upon which many have talked in private, and no possible harm can come by mentioning it in public. I believe it is of supreme importance to our cause and our work that we should possess a strong, bright, interesting weekly newspaper. And the question I desire to ask is this: Has not the time arrived when The Inquirer and the Christian Life could be amalgamated? It has become a waste of resources and of effort to continue issuing two weak papers, each struggling for existence, in a small community like ours. The controversies which made two newspapers necessary have now happily died out. There are no longer two schools of Unitarians. He would be a bold man who ventured to say how many schools of theory and of practice there are among us nowadays. If the signed and unsigned articles in both papers were placed together, it would often require a college of experts to determine which was the more conservative of the two journals. There ought not to be any difficulty in affording a place in the columns of one paper for the full and frank expression of such varieties of opinion and sentiment as exist among us. We require a paper not for ministers alone, but for everybody, for the laity, the family, and the common people. It is surely possible, by combining our forces and our finances—for the denominational paper cannot, I fear, be made self-supporting—to produce a journal which would meet the needs of our community as a whole. The subject is certainly one which deserves, and, indeed, demands, most earnest consideration.

In the interesting discussion which followed, the Revs. A. Chalmers, H. Rawlings, W. R. Shanks, H. E. Dowson, E. W. Lummis, Messrs. Arnold Lupton and J. Harrison, and the President took part. There was a general concensus of opinion as to the desirability of having only one paper to represent our whole body. Mr. Chalmers pleaded for one thoroughly good hymn-book, and Mr. Harrison urged a book with tunes. The President pointed out that there were once three papers, now reduced to two, and agreeing that there should be only one, asked also, why two colleges? Mr. Lummis pleaded for the unifying of our institutions all round.

The Rev. J. E. Manning then read his paper on "The Need of Emphasising Unitarian Theology in our Churches."

There was, he said, great ignorance in many of our people as to the true significance of Unitarianism, and indefiniteness in the pulpit on this subject was one of the chief causes of our weakness. What was called breadth often meant only vagueness. It was needful that people should understand the foundations of their religious belief, but so also of their theological belief; such knowledge was due from the minister to the young. They ought to know of the rise and growth of the doctrine of the Trinity, of Christ's belief in the simple unity of God, the growing corruption of belief, and the brave confession of the protesters, and of the scriptural grounds of Unitarian theology. The story of great Unitarians, from Servetus to Channing, should be familiar to them. A preacher did not do his duty unless he gave his hearers clear knowledge of fundamental truth. Schleiermacher said: "It is the union of the theologian and the pastor which makes the father of the Church." The minister must be a true pastor, but he must also help his people to an intellectual grasp of religion. All great leaders in the Church had been great as theologians, and some, such as Augustine and Calvin, through their theology, had done immense harm. But the true theology of Jesus never did any harm. God is our Father, God is Love, God is One. Children could understand it, the aged could rest in it; and that was what they had to teach. Schleiermacher's saying had its perfect exemplification in Channing, and he was the best model for a Unitarian minister. They must emphasise Unitarian theology because it was truer than any other, because it was needed by those who had lost hold of the orthodox beliefs, because it was simple and intelligible, and because of its honourable history. It was a creed of simple devoutness and common sense. To young and old alike it offered all the help they needed. It had availed in the past, as they well knew; and on all those grounds it should be emphasised in their churches.

In the discussion which followed, the Revs. C. Hargrove, W. H. Eastlake, J. A. Pearson, J. J. Wright, J. E. Stronge, D. Agate, Messrs. A. Lupton, Harrop White, S. Harris, Miss Alice Lucas, Mrs. Collins Odgers, and the President took part. From different sides it was urged that we must have clear convictions and clearly teach them, and not neglect the early instruction of our children. Miss Lucas expressed surprise that the teaching of doctrine had been put in the first place, as they stood for religion pure and simple, and the Church lived for something higher than doctrine; and Mrs. Collins Odgers asked whether, when they came together, it was to listen to what the minister said, and not simply to what God said to them, not only through the preacher, but through all other agencies in the Church? In reply, Mr. Manning said that he fully agreed that religion must hold the first place; but, after twenty-five years in the ministry, he was convinced it was most necessary for a minister to be absolutely clear and to the point in matters of theology.

The President also took the opportunity of referring to the fact that Mr. Hargrove had just completed twenty-five years of ministry at Mill Hill Chapel, and added words of very high appreciation and of congratulation to minister and congregation.

After a closing hymn, the Benediction was pronounced by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal.

Sunday-School Conference.

After lunch a well-attended Sunday-school Association Conference was held in the museum lecture-theatre, the Rev. H. E. Dowson in the chair.

Mr. Ion Pritchard read a report as to the work of the Association, referring specially to new and forthcoming publications, and a useful conversation on the subject followed, after which Miss Marian Pritchard read a delightful paper on "The Teacher's Aim: To Raise the Scholar's Ideal." Under the President's guillotine brief speeches were made by the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, S. A. Steinthal, C. Hargrove, J. Ellis, T. W. Freckelton, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Sir James Kitson, and Mr. F. Clayton.

Sir James Kitson expressed his great pleasure in being present, and his regret that he had not been able to be at the meeting on the previous evening, and then spoke of the great service Sunday-schools rendered in bringing people of different classes together, which modern conditions of life and work separated so widely.

The Superannuation Fund.

After a brief interval for tea in an adjoining room, another meeting was held, when Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., took the chair, supported by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, Mr. David Martineau, and Mr. Cogan Conway. Mr. Carpenter gave an address explaining the nature of the proposed superannuation fund, which was for the benefit of ministers and congregations alike; and on the motion of Mr. A. C. Briggs, seconded by the Rev. C. Hargrove, a resolution was passed approving of the scheme, and commending it to the support of the Yorkshire churches.

In the evening a conversazione in the Priestley Hall brought the series of very pleasant and successful meetings to a close.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

It is an impossible task to record all the signs of activity in all our twenty-three churches, and yet it is not easy to make choice. Ministers and laity have settled down once again for a winter's work, and are all looking hopefully forward. Dealing with the Association first, I may say that there is no end of possible work, though a scarcity of money temporarily stands in the way. The Forward Movement subscriptions promised five or six years ago have, for the most part, terminated, and it is difficult to get them renewed owing to bad trade and increased income-tax. A special appeal is about to be made throughout the district for the funds necessary to maintain or subsidise the ministries at Bradford, Chorlton, Heaton Moor, Urmston, Middleton, and Oldham-road, where good work is being done, and where the prospects are bright and hopeful if only they can be tided over their financial difficulties for a few years. There is no telling what generous and timely help may lead to. My own church at Moss Side—which is probably numerically the strongest church in the district—was for the first three or four years helped financially by the Association; and, if it had not been, its enthusiasm might have been damped, and its efforts most certainly crippled. There is no church in the district now without a minister. Since I last wrote, the Rev. W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A., has been inducted at Sale, and a congregational soirée was held last week to give him and his wife a hearty welcome. There is a splendid field of labour at Sale: a beautiful church, well equipped in every way, and residential population which is fast increasing. Mr. Schroeder was an exceptionally able student of the Home Missionary College up to June last, his preaching is above the average in power and attractiveness, and his social qualities are such as to make it probable that a great development of Church life will result from his appointment. The next settlement was at Urmston, where the Rev. H. Kelsey White has undertaken ministerial duties. He also completed a very satisfactory course at the Home Missionary College last June, and as a preacher received special commendation from the Visitors at the last public examinations. He is full of earnestness, and believes in pastoral work as well as preaching; and it is confidently expected that many will be drawn into the fold, and find in his ministry the satisfaction of their religious needs. I have also to record the settlement of the Rev. A. W. Timmis at the Renshaw-street Domestic Mission. There was a good hearty spirit about the public welcome accorded to him the other night. He brings with him a ripe experience, and he will find in this populous district of Hulme any amount of work for which he may have time and strength. There are already signs that he will succeed in rallying round him the young life of the place, which so sadly needs the counsel and guidance of a sympathetic leader. The character of the mission is unsectarian. It is supported and controlled by Unitarians who glory in the fact that it is probably the only truly unsectarian mission (together with the one at Willert-street) in this great city of Manchester. There is still one more new appointment which I have to record. Mr. J. H. Rossington, B.A., late student of the Home Missionary College and Hibbert Scholar, has accepted an invitation to become the minister of Longsight Free Christian Church; his induction service and welcome soirée were held last Saturday afternoon and evening respectively, and were of an inspiring and encouraging character. Mr. Rossington is scholarly and earnest; he goes to a commodious and handsome church situated in the midst of a teeming population; and he will find round him a band of Unitarian veterans, whose church history is one of indomitable struggle and achievement. Longsight has hitherto been one of our puzzles. The church is practically free from debt; it stands prominently; has a voluntary choir second to none in our district; has had a succession of able ministers, and yet has made no headway in recent years. The present settlement, however, looks very promising—the minister is full of zeal, and the congregation hearty and hopeful; and surely these are the essentials of a useful and prosperous Church life.

The Congregational Union held its autumnal meetings in Manchester last week, under the presidency of the Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker. It afforded some of the members of our own churches great pleasure in extending hospitality to ministers and delegates, just as Congregational friends in other towns have always so generously entertained us on the occasion of our National Conference gatherings.

Two or three weeks ago I was preaching in our charming old chapel at Hale, and noticed that new windows had been put in, which, though quite in keeping with the character of the building, allow more light to pass through, and much improve its appearance. I am told that a scheme is on foot for the erection of a porch at the entrance,—an addition which will be highly appreciated in wet and stormy weather. The chapel was quite full and the singing hearty the evening I was there. Quite a number of houses have recently been erected at Hale, which will soon be like an extension of Bowdon, as far as residences are concerned; and this has meant, and will doubtless continue to mean, an accession to our congregation there.

Our friends at Upper Brook-street are holding a bazaar next month, for the purpose of raising £1,000 with which to renovate the fabric of the church; redecorate church and schools; improve the lighting of the church, and assist the church finances. They have shown such facility for raising money on previous occasions, that we naturally expect them to realise their ambition now. The bazaar will assume the form of an Old English village, and will be held on Nov. 6, 7, 8, and 9.

I think it was in my last letter that I mentioned the Rev. A. Cobden Smith's appointment as clerical superintendent of the Lower Mosley-street Sunday-school. I hear his work spoken of with the highest praise. He is securing the friendship and respect of the scholars all round. Somehow Cross-street Chapel had lost its hold upon them. With few exceptions they could not be induced to attend its services, although they might almost have filled its empty pews. So the Cross-street trustees resolved to devote a part of their endowment towards providing the stipend of a clerical superintendent, who should organise the work of the school, visit sick scholars, and in every possible way promote the religious life of the school. Upon experiment Mr. Smith finds that the adults will gladly come to a Sunday evening service conducted by him in the School building, and he tells me he gets a congregation of 150 respectable and intelligent people, and that there seems every likelihood of that number considerably increasing. The only criticism that one can pass on this movement is that at present there is neither subscription nor offertory, and one wonders why these folk have not hitherto attached themselves to Cross-street Chapel or some other of our churches. I hope this is not unkind comment; for, after all, it is a grand—very grand—thing to get 150 men and women to unite weekly in common worship, who previously went into no church at all. Mr. Smith is throwing himself heart and soul into the work, and he deserves to succeed.

It is difficult to say much about one's own affairs. You have been good enough to insert a drawing of our new church at Moss Side, and also a report of our opening proceedings on Oct. 5. The building fully meets our expectations. Its acoustic properties are good, and the preacher is heard well in every part. It was crowded at the dedication service, and again each Sunday evening since. Nothing could be more auspicious than this start-off of ours. The Revs. J. E. Carpenter, R. A. Armstrong, J. P. Hopps, and W. Copeland Bowie have sounded the true key-note, and left a deep and lasting impression behind them. Right glad were we to see Mr. Armstrong so vigorous once again; there seemed no trace of his recent indisposition; while as for Mr. Hopps, in spirit and power he seems to grow younger each time he comes north. The generous offertory at the opening is enabling us to proceed with some further and much-needed furnishing; but we intend ordering nothing which we cannot pay for. There is a great deal of enthusiasm throughout the congregation; we are all proud of our beautiful church; and we believe that increased usefulness lies before us: that all around the fields are white for harvest, and that we have a supreme opportunity which it would be a sin, indeed, to let slip. It all seems like a dream that in the short space of fourteen years we should hold in our possession, free from debt, a block of buildings costing £10,000, which we have solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God and the service of humanity. And yet, looking back upon our progress step by step, I can say there has been no element of chance in it. It is the well-earned reward of a loyal, earnest, devoted and generous people; who have always discussed freely, and then submitted to a majority vote; whose aim has been an unselfish one, and who, having realised the worth of devout religious worship to themselves, have, therefore, been extremely anxious to bequeath such a heritage to posterity as shall inspire their children's children with religious zeal, and give them every facility for influencing for good the lives of their fellow-men and women. Such a people as my folk at Moss Side would achieve similar results almost anywhere; and so whenever I go to any half-dead church of ours, situated nevertheless in the midst of a considerable population, I am wont to conclude that no matter what the fibre of the parson is, there is something radically wrong with the laity.

Pray excuse any apparently undue reference to Moss Side. Surely we are all everywhere working not for our own hands, but for the advancement of a great and noble cause. Let us endeavour to stir up enthusiasm in each other, and see to it that the best possible is done to promote the true prosperity of our churches.

Charles Roper.

Our friend, Mr. H. W. Hawkes, of Liverpool, is publishing next week, through Mr. Hare, an addition to his Series of Plays for Young People. The title of the new play is "The Unambitious Queen," and is described as a "Mediæval Dynastic Absurdity," founded on a story published in the Christian Register early in 1893.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast: All Souls' Church.—A very successful annual soirée of the congregation of All Souls' Church was held in the Central Hall on Saturday evening, Oct. 19. Invitations were issued by the Rev. W. H. and Mrs. Drummond and the Church Committee, and were largely responded to, several of the neighbouring ministers being also present. During the evening Mr. Drummond gave his annual address to the congregation. He dwelt especially upon the opportunities of the evening service and his desire to develop the corporate feeling and activity of the church. The Rev. J. E. Carpenter, of Oxford, followed with some earnest and timely words, which were felt by all who heard them to be full of encouragement. On the following day Mr. Carpenter preached the annual sermons in All Souls' Church. Large congregations assembled at both services.

Bridgwater.—On Sunday last the annual Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. John McDowell, of Bath. Good congregations were present morning and evening, who listened with interest to two discourses on "In the Days of Thy Youth" and "Wait on your Teaching." On Monday evening Mr. McDowell delivered to a good audience a lecture, entitled "A Visit to Palestine and Egypt." He carried his hearers with him with unflagging interest as he conducted them, carried by the R.M.S. Ophir, to the various ports of interest on the Mediterranean from Gibraltar to Beyrout and then to Jaffa, entertaining them with incidents (by the way, historical narrative and descriptions of people and places. The points of interest of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany, &c., were lucidly presented, leaving the impression that Palestine was a real land, and its people living human beings. A flying visit was then made to Cairo, the Nile, the Pyramids, and Sphinx, concluding a lecture which was instructive, interesting, and amusing. The cordial thanks of the meeting were given to the lecturer. The Rev. T. B. Broadrick presided.

Burnley.—On Wednesday week, in commemoration of their silver wedding, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Mackie entertained a large number of their friends at the Trafalgar-street School, the company including Lady O'Hagan, Councillors Bibby, Dickinson, and Roberts, and the Rev. E. A. Voysey, minister of the church. Mr. Mackie is secretary of the congregation, and for thirty years has been an ardent worker for the cause. For upwards of twenty years he acted as one of the school superintendents, and is now one of the leaders of the Sunday afternoon adult class. The occasion of his silver-wedding party was therefore taken to make a presentation of a silver tea service to Mr. and Mrs. Mackie, marking the grateful recognition of the congregation. Mr. James Halstead presided at the presentation, which was made in cordial terms by Mr. Councillor Bibby, and Mr. Mackie, with much feeling, responded.

Bury, Lancs.—The receipts at the Bank-street bazaar last week amounted to over £2,000, and the successful result is most gratifying, not only from the financial point of view, but as an impetus to healthy congregational life.

Derby.—At Friargate Chapel the Harvest Festival was combined last Sunday with the chapel anniversary, the services, morning, afternoon, and evening, being conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham. On Monday the annual tea-meeting was held in the schools, and was well attended. The Rev. J. Birks, who presided, spoke of the prosperous condition of their institutions, and addresses were also given by the Revs. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, W. Lindsay, J. Kertain Smith, and Dr. Griffiths. The choir rendered anthems, and the services and meeting were very successful.

Guildford.—The Guildford Literary and Debating Society has once more convened its meetings in the Social Room of the Ward-street Free Church. The Session opened admirably on Monday, Oct. 7, with a lecture by Mr. Alfred J. Roberton, entitled "More Memories of India and its People." The Mayor of Guildford, Mr. George Tayler, J.P., the President of the Society, occupied the chair. Amongst the speakers subsequent to the lecture was the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Leigh, Manchester, the founder of the society, and formerly minister of the church.

Leigh: Lancs.—During the past few weeks the church and schools have been painted and decorated throughout, and on Sunday last anniversary and re-opening services were held. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin conducted a scholars' service in the morning; and afternoon and evening the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester, preached to large and interested congregations, and the services were very highly appreciated by all who attended them.

London: Deptford.—On Thursday week, a social meeting was held in the General Baptist Church to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the Rev. A. J. Marchant's settlement as minister. A good number sat down to tea, and a public meeting following was presided over by the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, of Lewisham, who made a sympathetic speech; Councillor J. G. King, church secretary, in making a financial statement, also moved a resolution of congratulation to Mr. Marchant, of gratitude for the past and earnest hope for the future. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Soone, and supported by the Rev. Harvey Smith, President of the General Baptist Assembly, and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, minister-at-large. The latter referred feelingly to the bereavements incidental to human life, and their value as a means of sympathy between pastor and people. Messrs. Pain, Christie, and George Ward expressed congratulations to the pastor, and thanks to the chairman and visitors. Mr. Marchant replied with much feeling. Great pleasure was felt in the cheering presence of so many friends from Lewisham Church, Bermondsey also being well represented.

London: Little Portland-street.—The Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., has begun the autumn work with two courses of sermons—one called the "Voices of the Poets," in which each Sunday he interprets, in a Christian sense, some well-known poem; the other began with the statement of Unitarian belief about the Bible, Jesus Christ, and miracles, leading up to a course on Harnack's "What is Christianity?" which will commence on Sunday morning, Nov. 3. Handbills of these courses of sermons were distributed in the neighbourhood, and each Sunday, so far, some strangers have visited the chapel. On Wednesday, Oct. 16, a very successful lantern lecture was delivered to the members of the Congregational Society by the Hon. Secretary, Miss H. Busk. The subject, "A Holiday in Sicily," was connected in a very interesting way with varied historical and archæological changes which the island has witnessed, from the time of the Phœnicians to the present day. A large number of lantern slides, many of them specially prepared for the lecture, and some interesting curios and photographs, were exhibited. The next lecture to be given to the Society, by the Rev. Dr. Hicks, of Islington, will be on Oct. 30. On Thursday, the 17th, Dr. Maughan gave a lecture to a large audience at the Social Club of the Portland Institute, the subject being "The House we Live in." A number of lantern slides of the human frame were exhibited, and the lecture was much enjoyed.

London: Stratford.—At the Harvest Thanksgiving Services on Oct. 13, the preacher was Mr. C. F. Dear, of Southend. There was special music at each of the three services, which were well attended.

Manchester: Longsight.—On Saturday last the induction of the Rev. H. J. Rossington, B.A., took place, when a most impressive service was held in the church, conducted by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A. Mr. John Heys expressed the congregational recognition of Mr. Rossington as the minister of the church, to which the latter suitably responded. The right hand of fellowship was extended to the new minister by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the charge being delivered by the Rev. Principal Gordon, M.A., and the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., a former minister of the church, gave the charge to the congregation. The music by the choir consisted of the quartett, "God is a Spirit," and the duet and chorus from Mendelssohn's St. Paul "Now are we ambassadors" and "How lovely are the messengers." In the evening a welcome soirée was held in the Gaskell Hall, when Mr. John Heys took the chair, and welcomed Mr. Rossington on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. Dan Baxter on behalf of the Sunday-school. The President of the Manchester District Association, the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, in addition to those who took part in the service, addressed the meeting. Several part songs were rendered by the choir. The gatherings were well attended.

Newry.—At the Harvest Thanksgiving Services at the First Presbyterian Church last Sunday, the preacher was the Rev. W. J. Davies, of Belfast, and for the first time in its history the church was decorated for the occasion.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting of the Union was held at Flowery Field on Saturday last, and was attended by representatives of almost all the fourteen schools in the Union. After tea, of which about 130 teachers and friends partook, the chair was taken by the Rev. T. R. Elliot, of Mossley, President, supported by the Revs. H. E. Dowson, H. S. Tayler, A. K. Andreæ, and Mr. A. Slater. The reports of the Treasurer and Secretary were read and adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year elected, with Mr. E. B. Broadrick as President. It was decided that the Union should assist the Mottram congregation in raising a memorial tablet to the late Mr. John Barrow. The President, on behalf of the Union, gave a cordial welcome to the Rev. A. K. Andreæ, B.A., on his settlement as assistant minister at Gee Cross, after which Mr. George Cocks, of Gorton, read a most interesting paper on "Boys' Brigades: Are They Useful to Sunday Schools?" A contingent of fifty members of the Brookfield Boys' Own Brigade was present from Gorton, and gave an object-lesson on the drill, &c., used. The contingent marched from Flowery Field back to Gorton at the close of the parade. An excellent discussion followed, and after various votes of thanks the evening hymn and Benediction closed a very interesting and profitable gathering.

Preston.—For some time past a movement, instigated by Mr. R. Newell, of Preston, has been on foot for the formation of a union of churches and Sunday-schools in North Lancashire, to include Preston, Blackpool (north and south), Chorley, and Lancaster. On Sunday evening a meeting of the Preston congregation was held to appoint delegates to a conference to be held in Preston to make arrangements for the formation of the Union, when Messrs. Rawsthorn, Parkinson, and Barker were appointed delegates. The representatives of the Sunday-school at the conference will be the Rev. N. Anderton, Messrs. R. Newell and H. Preston, and Miss B. Preston. On Sunday, the 13th inst., the Preston congregation celebrated the ingathering of the harvest, in special services at which collections were taken on behalf of the chapel funds.

Shrewsbury.—On Sunday evening a memorial tablet, erected in the High-street Church, in memory of the late Mr. John Oliver, was unveiled at the conclusion of the service, in the presence of a large congregation. The ceremony was performed by Mr. W. Vickery and Mr. R. Mansell (secretary), while the Rev. J. C. Street spoke in eulogistic terms of Mr. Oliver's character. The tablet bears the following inscription:—"Near this spot sat and worshipped John Oliver, J.P., a working-man of simple life and pure character; a member of the Town Council, who for his rare intelligence and well-balanced judgment was called to the magisterial bench, which he adorned by his urbanity and keen sense of justice. He joined this church because of his conscientious acceptance of the great religious principles which it represents and teaches, and he was a faithful member of it to the end of his life. He died on Jan. 18, 1900, and was buried in the General Cemetery amid signs of mourning throughout the community. This tablet is raised to perpetuate his memory by the gifts of many friends."

Torquay.—A lecture was delivered in Unity Hall on Monday last (21st) by Mr. P. Q. Karkeek, M.R.C.S., on "Manners and Customs in England in the Fourteenth Century," and was illustrated by numerous lantern slides of old English life. Examples of old English vocal music were also given by a glee party. The Rev. A. E. O'Connor presided over a large attendance, and the lecture was thoroughly appreciated by those present.

Whitchurch.—The second of a series of special week-night services was held in the Church of the Saviour on Wednesday week, the preacher being the Rev. A. H. Shelley, of Dudley.

ENGLAND'S SHAME.

In the month of September, 1,964 children perished in the South African Concentration Camps.

This is the fruit of England's policy,
This awful hecatomb of children's bones.
Listen; across the ocean come faint moans
Mingled with mothers' weeping; yet do we Harden our hearts and press on stubbornly.
What worth is in our dreams of sovereign sway
And Empire's greatness, if we needs must pay
Such price as this to win our victory?
O, let them haunt us, these wan murdered ones,
Their huddled ghosts crowd round our winter fires,
Obscure the glory of our summer suns,
A cloud of witnesses, that never tires
Of its sad wail of suffering, till the shame
Do rouse once more some care for England's fame!

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Writing to the Times on the subject of the children in the Concentration Camps, Canon Gore makes the following plea:—

Immediate steps, however costly—whether by the speedy introduction of suitable nourishment into the camps in sufficient abundance or by the removal of the camps to the sea—must be taken to obviate this unexampled and horrible death-rate among the children for whose protection we have, by a policy which may have been mistaken but is, at any rate, not now reversible, made ourselves responsible. Otherwise, I believe, the honour of our country will contract a stain which we shall not be able to obliterate, and the whole Christian conscience of the country will be outraged and alienated.

It will be seen from our report of the Council Meeting of the B. and F.U.A. that the Rev. Lawrence Scott made a fruitless attempt at the end of the meeting to bring this question forward. We have heard of resolutions on the subject passed during the week by the congregations of Brighton, Bessells Green and the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool. The Rev. F. T. Reed, of Colyton, writes to ask "whether anything is being done on behalf of the wives and children of the loyalists out there?" and is of opinion that "something should certainly be done for them, unless indeed they are not in need of help." Certainly they are not suffering and dying as are the children in the Concentration Camps.

In this week's Guardian appears a letter from Mr. A. M. S. Methuen, stating the facts as to the mortality in the Concentration Camps, and emphasising the statement of Lord Milner that the formation of the camps was adopted "purely on military grounds as a means for hastening the end of the war." Strongly urging the removal of the Transvaal and Orange River camps, he adds:—

I hope your readers will not think that I am accusing our Generals and soldiers of deliberate inhumanity. I do not believe that any Englishman in his senses would make such a charge, but I do most strongly feel that if we allow these camps to remain in their present sites—if, knowing the facts, but closing our eyes to their horrible significance, we do not urge our Government to move these camps—we must be held guilty of the death of these children.

I do not write as a partisan; I am simply anxious to bring these facts before the attention of the clergy, and to ask them whether it is consistent with our civilisation and our religion that we should look on in helpless apathy at the rapid destruction of the little prisoners whom we have dragged from their homes. Will any of your readers who feel inclined to condemn me for want of patriotism endeavour to project their minds to a date distant from now, it may be a year or it may be two years? What will be their feelings if by that time the world will have the right to say that England permitted a half, or three-quarters, or the whole of the infant population of the two republics to perish because their fathers and brothers refused to accept her rule?

The mortality returns from the Concentration Camps are arousing deep feeling in Manchester and district. There have been many protests in the papers and various proposals. On Wednesday a public meeting was held on the initiative of the Revs. C. Peach, J. K. Maconochie, and Dr. Arnold. The meeting was crowded out by a most influential gathering of prominent men and women in all walks of Manchester public and commercial life. The chair was taken by the President of the Chamber of Commerce, and a resolution expressing the deep concern of the meeting and calling on the Government to take instant action in the interest alike of the Boer people and of British honour was unanimously passed on the motion of the Rev. C. Peach, seconded by the Rev. Dr. Goodrich, and supported by Archdeacon Wilson and many others. It was further resolved to memorialise the Lord Mayor, praying him to convene a town's meeting on the subject.

The Twenty-first anniversary of Dr. Horton's ministry at Hampstead, and of the Lyndhurst-road Congregational Church was celebrated on Tuesday, when Dr. Fairbairn preached at a morning service, and the speakers at an enthusiastic evening meeting included Mr. H. H. Asquith, K.C., M.P., Mr. W. L. Courtney, editor of the Fortnightly Review, the Rev. R. J. Campbell of Brighton, and Dr. Horton himself. Mr. Asquith, in his address, said that the most striking difference between the Evangelical churches of the old days and these was that then they were introspective and self-centred, now they were altruistic and philanthropic. The message of the older preachers, "Save yourself!" had become in the mouth of their successors, "Save others!" The Hampstead Church, which was founded Oct. 27, 1880, and met first in a little iron building, has now 1,200 members, and is said to be the largest Congregational church in the Empire.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, by an agreement with the London County Council, terminable by three months' notice on either side, has given up nearly ten acres of the grounds attached to Lambeth Palace to be used as a people's park. Public meetings are not to be held in the park, in which one enclosure is reserved for women and children. The fields have been used for play under restrictions before, but the present arrangement, which the Archbishop wishes to continue during his lifetime, gives for the first time a full and free enjoyment of the grounds to the people.

The Humanitarian League has organised a winter course of lectures on "Pioneers of Humanitarianism," which will be held in the Council Room, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., on the following Tuesday evenings, at 6 P.M.:—Nov. 5, "Shelley," by Henry S. Salt (Dr. Furnivall in the chair); Dec. 3, "Tolstoy," by Aylmer Maude; Jan. 14, "Ruskin," by W. J. Jupp; Feb. 4, "Wagner," by Mrs. Leighton Cleather.

REFERRING to Mr. Jacks's recent address at Manchester College, Oxford, with its dream of a new Preaching Order, the Christian World quotes his doleful picture of the minister preaching in an old chapel to "six adults, four children, and fifty-seven gas-lights," and agreeing with the lecturer that such a state of things does not seem a triumph of practicality, adds:—

One would think a man under such circumstances would long since have left the pulpit and delivered his message from the doorstep outside. The reproach made against English traders, that they fail to adapt their goods to the wants of possible customers, is surely nowhere so just as when applied to churches such as Mr. Jacks describes. When the audience consists mainly of gas-lights, it is time for a new plant and a new management. We shall be curious to note what response is made to this appeal amongst the speaker's co-religionists. Apostolates require apostles. Are they forthcoming from the Unitarianism of to-day? The Luthers and the Wesleys do not spring up simply because college lecturers call for them. Their genesis is of another order. If Mr. Jacks's constituency contains the needed prophet within its borders we shall be glad to welcome him.

AUCKLAND UNITARIAN CHURCH.

AT the Council Meeting of the B. and F.U.A. on Wednesday reference was made to the vigorous life and hopeful prospects of the Auckland Unitarian Church, under the care of the Rev. W. Jellie, B.A., and it is very pleasant in that connection to see a copy of the New Zealand Graphic of Aug. 24, which a friend sent us recently, containing an illustration of the stone-laying of the new church which is being built in Ponsonby-road, "the first Unitarian church in New Zealand." A brief devotional service was conducted on that occasion by Mr. Jellie, and two stones were laid, by himself and Captain Lamb, of Mahuranji Heads. By grace of the photographer and the Graphic we see Mr. Jellie standing there amid a group of friends all bent upon the one act, as a stone is laid. The church itself, as it is to be, of which we have also seen a slight sketch, is modest in proportions and not ungraceful in form, with a slender spire springing from the centre of the roof, and a friendly verandah at the entrance.

"I greet you in the name and spirit of Him whose name we bear. I congratulate you on this beginning of the fruition of many hopes and labours. We raise this church in no spirit of antagonism to other churches, in no spirit of narrow sectarianism. The City of God has its families, its friends, and neighbours, whose independence, as well as interdependence, make it a true city. We aspire to be one family in the City of God. The significance of this event lies in its unexampled freedom. I think we may claim to be the freest church in this city. It is our care to keep the present and the future alike unfettered in creed, ritual, or even name. The spirit of God is like the wind that bloweth where it listeth; and we build no barriers that may not be taken down at a moment's notice to allow ourselves and those who come after us perfect liberty to follow every leading of the spirit of reverence and truth. Never was such a free foundation more needed. You are aware of the prodigious changes of our time. A truer philosophy of human nature is lifting it out of the wreck of its abasement, and declaring that salvation means deliverance not from future wrath, but present sin. Larger views of history are teaching the rise, and not the fall, of man, with an assurance of human progress bearing us on towards an unseen goal. The conceptions of science are everywhere revolutionising our religious ideas. The democratic movement of the time is inspiring the Churches with nobler ideals and fresh enthusiasm. Everywhere it is springtime in the world of thought. Everywhere there are fresh adaptations of truth to the service of humanity. Our work is to serve man. We are definitely on the side of the new ideas in religion, partly because we cannot help ourselves, partly because we know that the new ideas are more helpful than the old. This is to be a place of Divine service, but we remember that the service to which the Master calls is the service of man. That service will take the form of prayer and preaching to cherish and quicken within us the springs of a higher life. But it will not be confined to that. It will also take whatever form of brotherly helpfulness the needs of those we touch may demand and we can supply. There will be no artificial restraints on our knowledge, our judgment, or our affections. If our free Church has not the largest sympathies, it ought to have. If it is not most deeply devout, it ought to be. For we value our freedom only as a means to this end—that it may make us riper, richer, and more enriching. 'For God and humanity' is our motto. To this service we dedicate our building. To this service we dedicate ourselves. May the spirit of the Master hallow all our work!"

AUSTRALIAN RELIGION.

SIR,—Kindly allow me a little space to correct some errors into which the Rev. Mr. Lambley has fallen in his article on "The Condition of Religious Life in Australia," which appears in your issue of Aug. 17.

Mr. Lambley says there are three Unitarian Churches in Australia, none of them fifty years old and none flourishing. I have no personal knowledge of either the Melbourne or Sydney Church, but as regards that of Adelaide, Mr. Lambley is wrong in his remarks. In the first place, our church is very nearly fifty years old, though why Mr. Lambley attaches importance to that fact is hard to understand. Secondly, we have a fine little church in one of the best streets in the city and a school-room nearly as large; these stand on a large block of freehold land, part of which was purchased in the "fifties" when the church was founded, part presented to us by one of our members, since dead. Recently a leading member of our congregation, at his own cost, added a beautiful chancel to the church, and the remainder of the members made an effort and subscribed for and purchased a fine new pipe organ. Mr. Lambley will please note that, with all this, we are entirely clear of debt. Our church will seat 250, and is fairly filled every Sunday morning and well filled every Sunday evening; and within the last year or two our members have been steadily reinforced by persons drawn to us by the eloquence of Mr. Wilson, the cultured Irish gentleman whom we are so fortunate to have as minister. We have a large and good volunteer choir; we have a Sunday-school with an average attendance of sixty. And especially we have a considerable number of young people attending the church regularly whose fathers, in some cases whose grandfathers, were prominent in the original founding of the church.

Turning to another point, Mr. Lambley quotes, at length, Dr. Strong's impression of religious life in Victoria. Dr. Strong is known and respected by all interested in the cause of religious freedom in Australia, and his opinion is most interesting, but he is careful to say that he speaks of matters in the State of Victoria only. Mr. Lambley, however, steps into the breach at once; he says "Dr. Strong's description is depressing . . . it is probably equally true of all the other States, although some modification would be necessary in the case of New Zealand and Tasmania." Is it impertinent to ask Mr. Lambley how long he spent in, let us say, the huge States of South and West Australia, studying the state of religious feeling, before arriving at the above momentous conclusion. And why, oh! why, is Tasmania set on a pedestal above her sister States in Federated Australia? (I say nothing of New Zealand knowing nothing of that colony.)

Adelaide, South Australia, Sept. 18.

SIR,—I received the other day a copy of a letter Mr. Kay, of Adelaide, had sent on to you. Mr. Kay says in his letter to me that I have done an "injustice" to Adelaide. May I say in reply that nothing was farther from my intention than anything of that kind. I endeavoured to give a faithful presentation of the condition of religious life in Australia, and I do not see anything in Mr. Kay's letter to show that Adelaide ought to have been specially mentioned.

I do not know on whose behalf Mr. Kay speaks, but I can hardly think he speaks for the congregation. Were it necessary or desirable I could produce evidence that would show that my statement, as a general statement, was quite correct; but I imagine it is neither necessary nor desirable.

On one thing our Adelaide friends are to be congratulated—their Sunday-school, which, as Sunday-schools go out here, is in an excellent condition, and they are fortunate in having a band of young ladies who are enthusiastic in its behalf. May they never grow old!

R. H. LAMBLEY.

Melbourne, Sept. 25.

AT a meeting of the General Committee of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, held at Bolton, October 24, 1901, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That in the opinion of this Committee, representing twenty-eight churches, it is highly desirable that, if possible, THE INQUIRER and the Christian Life should be amalgamated into one representative weekly journal."

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE CHURCHES AND MINISTERS.

DEAR FRIENDS,—

The Ministers' Superannuation, or "Pensions and Insurance," Fund, started at the Essex Hall meeting last Whitsuntide, has now, through the abundant generosity of our laity, reached the sum of £15,280 8s. 2d. Broadly speaking, £3,000 more is required to complete the figure of £18,000, and thus secure the two final donations of £1,000 each from Mr. Colfox and Mr. Nettlefold. It is highly desirable that this amount should be promised by the end of the year and collected next January, so that the money may be invested in the names of trustees appointed by the donors as soon as possible in 1902, and earn a year's income to aid insuring ministers in January, 1903.

How is this remaining sum to be raised?

There are, no doubt, many wealthy and generous contributors whose help has not yet been asked. These, it may be hoped, will respond with the goodwill to which the subscription lists already testify. Meetings have been held in different parts of the country with most satisfactory results, and further meetings for this end are still in prospect. But it is impossible for members of the Committee to visit every church; it is even difficult to visit every district, and organise meetings in every local Association. The Committee earnestly hope, therefore, that the churches will follow the example already set by several congregations, and gather up contributions themselves. This was done in a few cases in the North with excellent results, when the splendid sum of £50,000 was raised for the erection of Manchester College at Oxford.

In the present instance the members of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, were, we believe, the first to move in this direction. With the help of the minister and an energetic secretary, donations in modest sums amounting to about £40 were secured last summer; and a chapel collection on Oct. 13 added nearly £10 more. In other congregations (as at Newington Green and Hackney, London, at Leicester, at Nottingham, at Sheffield, Rotherham, and Chesterfield, and elsewhere) friends are following the same plan. Let none of our smaller churches be deterred from joining in this effort because they cannot give large amounts. Even half-crowns and shillings will reach large amounts as our Methodist friends well know, if we only get enough of them.

At the recent meeting in Belfast this suggestion was adopted with great readiness. But the spontaneous action of the congregation at Ballee opens up another way of help. Not only were they preparing (so their minister informed the Committee's deputation) to make a congregational collection, they had also already voted an annual subscription of £3. If such subscriptions, in varying amounts, became the general rule among our churches (there must always, of course, be exceptions), they would prove a most valuable addition to the income of the Fund, and might ultimately be almost equivalent to a modification of the scheme once suggested by a contributor, that each church should insure its own minister. A subscription of £5, which would not be felt at all by at least 100 of our congregations, would be more than half of the premium needed to insure a minister at 25 for the payment of £250 with profits at death, and an annuity of £52 from the age of 65 till death. A number of such congregational subscriptions would give a precious element of stability to the annual income from this source, and would enable the Committee to offer greater aid to the elder men now among us who will otherwise be debarred from availing themselves of the Fund. At the outset of any new enterprise there are sure to be special cases of hardship, and these it would be a great satisfaction to the Committee to meet generously. But they cannot do so, unless the churches furnish them with the means.

This is, we believe, the first occasion on which it has been sought to enlist all the churches in a common effort. It is not confined to one part of the United Kingdom—it has already drawn support from all. The reason is twofold. In the first place, the cause of the ministry is the cause of all the churches; and whatever lifts off from the preacher and pastor some of the burden of his inevitable care for the future, will render his work in the pulpit and among his people more efficient. In the second place, this Fund has been established by the resolution of our highest representative body. The churches which constitute the Conference are summoned to this enterprise by the votes of their ministers and delegates. We are confident that they will carry it through to a successful issue.

HUNGARIAN LETTER.

AN English lady who now resides in Rome told me some time ago that the Jesuits are rather excited about the Unitarian movements on the Continent. This rumour came to her notice some time after the London meetings of the International Council. The first ordinary meeting of that Council surpassed all the expectations we dared to form of it last year in Boston when it was established. And now that the remarkable collection of papers and addresses is set before the world all further doubt ceases that the right chord of the soul of European thinkers was touched. What a harmony of ideas! It will be good news to all those interested in this cause that Bishop Ferencz has decided to have the book translated and published in the Hungarian language. It will be just at the best time, because thinkers are thirsty for something new and wholesome. They are eagerly waiting for some new revelation in the world of religion, for the present chaotic state of things cannot last.

I may mention a very important incident. Last month at the annual meeting of the Hungarian Protestant Literary Society one of the lay presidents of the Lutheran Evangelical Churches in Hungary, Baron Pronay, a most influential man in the country, in an address at the annual meeting, expressed his desire that the Unitarians also should be invited to partake in their work. The liberal words of this gentleman were received with approval by the Lutherans all over the country; but the Calvinist Orthodox ministers, though not in the meeting, but in their papers, speak against it, and say that the Unitarians have no place in their society, any more than the Roman Catholics. The good fortune of this country is that the number of these intolerant men is continually diminishing. However, it is a great pity that just now, when the Roman Catholic reaction is at its height, Protestants, who are comparatively few, about two millions, should be in discord, and instead of holding together should quarrel on old questions, now entirely out of place. These short-sighted men might learn a good lesson from their foreign friends in Germany, France, Switzerland, and elsewhere. It is indeed surprising that those who speak most often of the Gospel forget the teaching of the Master.

I am glad to speak also of better news in this matter. The Reformed Calvinist Bishop of Transylvania was present at the opening festival of the New College at Kolozsvár and, in a speech at the dinner, offered his right hand of friendship in a most satisfactory manner. He said that he knew of no difference which should keep the two Churches apart from each other. Nay, we should work together in a most cordial sympathy. This speech was made four days after the one I referred to above, therefore not only laymen but also thinking ministers are prepared to find their way to co-operation with Unitarians.

Now, I must say a few words about Miss Tagart's company of English pilgrims and their effect here. I was very happy to learn from their remarks, private and public, that they were satisfied and pleased with their excursion. They have told you of their experience, let me tell ours. This was the largest company of English visitors that ever came here. The Minister of Commerce, as chief director of the State railways, showed great courtesy to the English guests, by securing two railway carriages for the whole journey beyond Budapest. This is to show that their visit was not looked upon here as simply a private pleasure excursion, but also as a kind of intercourse between the two nations. Thus our people showed their deep respect to the English nation for that noble service tendered to our refugees in 1850 and afterwards. Your literature, your poets and preachers are our masters on the stage and in the pulpit, and Hungarians, being of a small nation, are happy to take hold of such chances to express their sympathy and feeling of indebtedness. I think that England could hardly find a more sincere friend and sympathiser on the Continent than Hungary; and considering the constant progress of this country, and the increasing influence she is beginning to exercise in the affairs of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, England and other States will soon come to see that the peace and progress of Europe depends a great deal on the position which Hungary occupies in the East.

From a religious point of view the good effect of the English visitors was immeasurable. I speak first of all as a Unitarian, and I say with a strong conviction that the presence of such a large number of Unitarian men and women from all over England was the most conspicuous proof of a living bond of union of Unitarians all over the world. Nobody is entitled any longer to say that the intercourse between the Unitarians of the two nations was simply of an ecclesiastico-political character. We knew it was anything but this. Now, every one could see and be convinced of the fact.

I had far more to say in this connection, since I had the pleasure of being present with them in all places. But I must be content to point out two good results. The first and most lasting one is the lesson they taught our people of what congregationalism in church life means. Our people needed an encouragement and an example to see and learn that each member of a congregation is and has to be a working force in the church as well as out of it. The English Unitarian service, the very first Hungary ever saw, though much simpler than is usual with us, carried with it the heart and soul of all those several hundreds of Unitarians and non-Unitarians chiefly by the deeply-religious tone of the voice of the ministers who partook in the service, the beautiful harmony, and special character of the singing. It was, indeed, very touching for strangers to see men and women, old and young, rise together and take part in the singing. Our town people wanted this lesson very much, since within the last fifty years they have given up congregational singing almost entirely. Only some men and the students are now accustomed to join. I hope this will be altered in a short time.

I mention as another very touching event —a soirée which was arranged by our English friends. The chief part was Mr. Shrubsole's lecture, of which I shall say a few words in another letter. Miss Lawrence and the Rev. W. J. Davies sang English songs, Mr. Davies having shown his musical talent by learning the Hungarian national hymn on the railway from Budapest to Arad. He sang it at several places, and here at the evening all the Hungarians joining. Mr. Ginever and the Rev. E. C. Jones recited poems to the delight of all. A Hungarian young lady, Miss Györy, of Budapest, recited a poem of her own. A most touching part of the evening was a presentation of a token of the esteem and thanks of the party to Miss Tagart, to whom our thanks and gratitude are great, and will last for a very long time.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

Sir, — My friend Mr. Wicksteed's doubt that full colonial rights had been offered to the inhabitants of the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony would take me as much by surprise as Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's declaration seems to have taken him, if I did not see that the absence of a definition of terms is at the bottom of our difference. He writes, as all those who take his view write, as if the Transvaal had been inhabited solely by the pastoral Boers. In fact, the numerical majority of the population, and that upon which the Government depended for its support as a powerful State, was urban and non-Boer. The position was—the illustration is not my own—as if the accidents of history had placed Liverpool and its wealth under the absolute control of a State composed of ignorant Welsh farmers. Assuming time to be given for the return of the Transvaal to its normal condition, and assuming the loyal acceptance of the new order of things, the language, the hearty and sincere language, of our statesmen has always been that full colonial rights would follow. Is it conceivable that Mr. Wicksteed thinks it possible or desirable to approach the wandering juntas of Mr. Schalk Bürger and Mr. Steyn with a diplomatic offer of the reinstatement, now and in the present condition of things, of them, their diminished forces and our prisoners of war, as the dominating power in Central South Africa? The advocates of the Boers appear to me to forget that we are at war for the equality of the white races throughout South Africa. I am not ashamed to contend that empire has among its peculiar duties, just as all sovereign powers have, the duty of maintaining its own place, and that to allow a great population of British subjects to be kept in the position which they held in the Transvaal would have been a breach of that duty. To give up this attitude, and to treat with the present Boer leaders as the legitimate representatives of the inhabitants of the Transvaal, for that is what appears to be contended, would therefore, to my mind, be a grave dereliction of duty.

I do not believe for a moment that Lord Salisbury's denial of "a shred of independence" was meant to contravene in principle the repeated declarations of his colleagues. Most unfortunately he cannot help saying rasping things, and he is probably the reverse of sanguine respecting the time required for a real settlement of the country. But all the independence he meant to deny was independence outside of the Colonial Empire; and it is that independence, and more, and, most of all, an unquestioned right to treat the blacks as they please, for which I, with most of my countrymen, believe that the fight is being made by the Boers. The demand of the "unconditional surrender" of the remnant of the Boers who still wage a sporadic war in South Africa is merely in effect a demand for the cessation of anarchy, and for a free hand to ourselves to do even justice among all the races which inhabit it. Could any nation in our position which has made the sacrifices which we are making, which has defeated the regular armies of their antagonists, taken their capitals, and dispersed their Governments, be expected by any reasonable man to demand less? In my humble opinion it is one of our Imperial responsibilities and our duty to demand it, and to enforce our demand.

T. Smith Osler.

THE HUMAN SELF AND ITS FREEDOM.

Sir,—In this discussion it is necessary that we should clearly understand what we mean by moral responsibility. Will some one of your correspondents give us a satisfactory definition of the phrase?

F. T. Mott.

Sir,—I send you a short contribution in response to your invitation to discuss the question of Free-will. I use the word "motive" to signify the impulses or springs of action which tend to produce human activity. These motives may be arranged along three different scales.

(1) The scale of natural, intrinsic strength. It may be admitted that where here is no further interference the strongest motive will prevail, and secure the form of activity required for its gratification. Indeed, we have no other criterion for the places in this scale than strength as shown in the power of thus prevailing.

(2) The scale of prudence, according to which motives are arranged in the order in which experience proves that they afford most pleasure in the long run. The order of these two scales is by no means the same, and we describe a character as impulsive or prudent according as the conduct is habitually regulated by pre-eminence in the first or the second scale. But when there is a contest between conflicting motives, and the most prudent, not the one which is naturally strongest, prevails, how does this take place? Obviously, the two contending forces are not of the same kind like weights in the two scales of a balance. The issue is not an automatic resultant of opposing forces. The will-power has intervened, not acting without reason, but in some way transforming the counsels of prudence by means of a mental nisus or effort so that they acquire power to prevail. If we look more closely at the nature of this mental nisus, we discover its purest type in an effort of attention. We can, if we will, so attend to the lessons of experience as to cause our conduct to be prudent, not impulsive. Here, in regard to this question whether we will thus attend or not, we have free choice, and this essential freedom is better regarded as a freedom of choice than of will.

(3) The scale of moral worth, according to which motives are higher and lower, and duty consists in giving effect to the higher motive. Here, again, there is no possibility of merely weighing moral worth against natural strength. The motive that is morally higher will have its own natural strength at any given moment, and it will not prevail against a lower motive which just then has greater natura strength unless there is interference from the will-power exercising its mental nisus by an act of attention, and freely choosing to do this. No doubt the struggle in such cases is often complicated by the entrance of a new force—namely, the influence of the Holy Spirit upon our spirits. This is a somewhat different subject into which I do not now enter, and only mention to show that I do not ignore it.

It seems to me very doubtful whether we can further explain the problem of Free-will. The ultimate fact is absolutely unique. We can only describe it in the best terms we can find for the purpose. We cannot bring it under any higher law or larger generalisation, or do anything more which comes under the head of scientific explanation. Nor is there the smallest need for our attempting the impossible task. What we do understand is sufficient for practical conduct as well as for intellectual satisfaction. Assuredly, all the important questions of moral education and of the influence of ennobling or degrading environment can be duly considered within the terms of the theory here set forth, and, at the same time, a proper place is kept for the most solemn feelings of remorse and moral responsibility.

H. Shaen Solly.

Bridport, Oct. 9.

Sir,—In any symposium on a philosophical theme we should begin by making clear what the theme is, and in what category we are to treat it. I submit that the problem, "Is the human will free to choose between right and wrong?" is a problem in psychology, and not in ethics. We may, if it seems necessary, go back into metaphysic for our premisses, but we have no right to spy forward towards the ethical consequences of our reasoning. That is to appeal to hope or fear, when the only valid appeal is to reason. It is no reply to any argument to warn the propounder that it has a momentous bearing on the philosophy of religion, or to call him a "soft determinist," or to assure him that its power over religious thought is almost entirely a thing of the past. What if so? The question remains, is it sound? is its conclusion true?

Mr. Upton upholds two theses: (1) There is a pure self, of which the pure self has immediate knowledge; (2) this pure self "can" choose between competing motives.

The former of these theses is formally divisible into two propositions—that there is a pure self, and that it has self-knowledge; but in effect everything depends upon the second proposition. If that be denied, the first becomes merely otiose, or at best a statement of one of the elements of the problem (namely, personal identity), and not a solution. But unless we give to the word "knowledge" some special meaning, peculiar to this case, "self-knowledge" is a contradiction in terms. Knowledge is a relation between x and y, the knower and the known; it cannot be without two terms. A relation between x and x is an absurdity in metaphysic, as great as is a straight line between A and A in geometry. In determinations so delicate, however, the least hint of vagueness vitiates our work: and in this proposition we have to choose between vagueness and absurdity. One might go further, and hold that since the "knowledge" here predicated is peculiar to this case it cannot be defined except by reference to this case; so that the proffered solution takes this form:—What is the pure self? That which has self-knowledge. And what is self-knowledge? That which is possessed by the pure self. Thus Mr. Upton's first thesis seems to be either a juxtaposition of incompatibles, that is, an absurdity, or else a fanciful restatement of the problem it pretends to solve.

Is his second thesis more helpful—that the pure self "can" choose between competing motives? It is not necessary to its purpose that the word "pure" should be retained. Let us say, can "I" choose between competing motives? As a fact of experience "I" undoubtedly can and do so choose. That is the matter to be explained; and we go on to ask, why do "I" so choose? What is the cause of "my" choosing this instead of that? Now unless we can discover and expound this cause, we cannot give a scientific explanation of the choice itself. Vere scire est per causas scire. All true science is the discovery of causes. The various determinist theories recognise this, and suggest, in terms varying with their psychology, that the actual choice which "I" made, and no other, was inevitably necessitated by the state of "my self" at the moment of choice. We feel that this leaves out of account an important element, "my" consciousness, at that moment, of debate, struggle and decision. This consciousness is so strong in "me" that even those deterministes who hold, as an intellectual truth, that it is illusory, are themselves unable to dissipate the illusion. Therefore we turn to the Libertarians, and ask for their answer to our question, What is the cause of "my" choice? And they reply, There is no cause! Whether they call the choice "free," or "indeterminate," or (like Mr. Upton) "a matter of chance," their answer still amounts to a denial of causation. This one thing in the cosmos is not cosmic: it is unrelated, unproduced, without a cause. As Dr. Mellone said, this answer is not "an adequate account of . . . our volitional activity." It is not science, but the abandonment of science. The admission of such a postulate rends up logic by the roots.

It is, indeed, an impermissible position. We may say, "here is something whose cause I cannot find," but never, "it has no cause."

So that while the determinist answer is unsatisfactory, because it leaves an important element in the problem unexplained, the libertarian answer is inadmissible.

Nevertheless, I believe that both contain some truth. The determinist has a very strong case; we can, if we will, lead lives in which will seems to be but a servant of the victor motive; but we will not—and there the libertarian seems to score.

I offer my own solution with fear and trembling. It is that causality, like space and time, is but a provisional and human way of interpreting phenomena, not an absolute and divine way, not a necessary part of God's thinking. When geometers tell us that there is, in their science, a theoretical straight line from A to A, but it is infinite, we comment, "it is beyond our understanding; our faculties of time and space are not designed for the infinite; we have reached their limit, and they fail us." So I say here, causality has reached its limit, and it fails us.

E. W. LUMMIS.

WESLEYANS AND EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT.

SIR,—Having read the Rev. Frank Walter's address on "Twentieth-century Unitarianism," and also your Birmingham correspondent's objection to Mr. Walter's statement on Wesleyanism and Eternal Punishment in that address, it has been intensely interesting to me, owing to my having recently withdrawn from Irish Methodism on my disavowal of that doctrine. In Irish Methodism every year the question is put to each minister: Do you believe and teach our doctrines? I answered that I did not believe, and, therefore, did not teach the doctrine of eternal punishment, and that if the district held that doctrine one of the doctrines of Methodism, then I did not believe and teach our doctrines. The entire district upheld it as one of the standard doctrines of Methodism, and I stood condemned. As a Methodist minister's son, and a Methodist minister's grandson on my father's and mother's side, I fully believe that the district was right so long as the "Wesleyan Standards" are held to be authoritative, for the "Wesleyan Standards" distinctly teach that the final state of the wicked will be immutable and eternal. If those Standard Sermons are not held authoritative for the Methodist minister any longer, and the doctrine of eternal punishment is surrendered, it then appears to me that the consistency of the Methodist teaching as Wesley held and taught it is gone for ever. Is there not behind the whole of Wesley's teaching a vital connection between the doctrines of Original Sin, Vicarious Atonement, and Eternal Punishment? Give up any one of these and the logical consistency of his system seems gone. Sin being infinite and eternal requires in consequence the necessity of redemption by One who is Infinite and Eternal, hence Wesley argued from the infinite nature of sin the Deity of Christ and his vicarious atonement, and taught his people to sing—

I tremble lest the wrath divine,
  Which bruises now my sinful soul,
Should bruise this wretched soul of mine
  Long as eternal ages roll.
I deprecate that death alone
  That endless banishment from Thee,
O save, and give me to Thy Son
  Who trembled, wept, and bled for me.

Any one reading his masterpiece against Taylor on "Original Sin," which was the basis of all his teaching, disbelieving the eternal punishment of sin, feels that the ground has gone on which the author rested, Wesley always feeling

  Assured if I my trust betray
  I shall for ever die!

Individual Methodists may disbelieve it, Methodist ministers may disavow it, but how they can disavow it, and yet say I believe and teach our doctrines as taught in those 52 sermons, can only be answered by themselves: certain it is Wesley enclosed inside his "Standards" which world-wide Methodism honours, and which still remain "Standards," the doctrine of eternal punishment. G. V. CROOK.

SIR,—If Mr. Walters is incorrect in his statement in regard to this matter, and the Wesleyan Circuit Steward is correct in saying that "nine out of ten of their young ministers openly disavow their belief in it," then the case is infinitely worse than most people imagine. When did these nine out of ten young ministers openly disavow their belief in the doctrine of Eternal Punishment? Was it before their ordination? Then how did they get into the Wesleyan ministry? Or, was it after they had publicly and solemnly subscribed the teaching of the Wesleyan Church, of which this doctrine is a part?

If these young ministers so recently declared their belief in this dogma, and, without notifying Conference of their change of belief, now proclaim the very opposite teaching, in my opinion they have put themselves outside the pale of moral and religious teachers.

Are not non-church-goers justified in saying, "Heal thyself, physician"?

Oct 28. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

ON A STUDY TABLE.

THE recent publication of the new edition of Mr. Frazer's famous treatise, "The Golden Bough," calls Mr. Andrew Lang again into the field, with a volume of essays on "Magic and Religion" (1). The contents are various; the most important are those in which Mr. Lang (1) re-states and defends his views concerning the high gods of low races, and

(1) London: Longmans, Green and Co. 1901. 10s. 6d.

(2) after criticising Mr. Frazer's theory that an Age of Magic preceded an Age of Religion, discusses the sky-piled series of conjectures by which Mr. Frazer accounts for the death of Jesus and the rise of the belief in his Deity. As to the controversy between Mr. Lang and Dr. Tylor, judgment must be suspended till the long-expected volume of Gifford Lectures, by the great Oxford anthropologist, shall be produced. Whatever psychological and other difficulties may lie in the way, Mr. Lang is doubtless justified in insisting that neglected facts shall be duly considered.

Readers of this journal will be more interested in the brilliant analysis by which this versatile and witty writer undermines Mr. Frazer's astonishing explanation of the origin of the doctrine which has gathered round the person of Christ. This explanation appears only as an episode in the vast web of research in which Mr. Frazer has made all students his debtors by the immense range of his learning, and his skill in framing hypotheses. It is difficult to state the theory briefly without making it appear absurd; for when the huge collections of collateral facts are stripped away, and the swathing of guesses and assumptions by which they are kept in their places is removed, the underlying historical reality seems to vanish altogether. Jesus is crucified at Jerusalem at a Passover-celebration; and prior to his execution he is treated as a mock-king. This part of his passion Mr. Frazer derives from a custom which he supposes the Jews to have practised at the feast of Purim, when he thinks that they may have crowned, and stripped, and scourged, and hung a condemned criminal as a mock-king. This was a kind of "Passion play," in which Haman was executed, and Mordecai (another prisoner) was released. To be sure, Purim and Passover are not the same; but they are placed within a month of each other, and the usage of the first may have been transferred to the second. What was the source of this strange Purim custom? It is derived by Mr. Frazer from a Babylonian origin, and is attached first to the Persian Sacaea, which in its turn represents an older Babylonian festival known as Zakmuk. At Zakmuk, it is conjectured, a condemned criminal was first robed and enthroned as king, and afterwards executed. Why? As proxy for the king of Babylon, who at an earlier age had been put to death each spring as a man-god, to provide a succession of vigorous human personalities for the incarnation of the god of vegetation. Jesus, then, dies as the condemned Haman, while Barabbas ("Son of the Father"), who plays Mordecai, is released. Finally a confusion of the two characters is suggested, by which Jesus—dying in historical evolution (though not in contemporary belief) as son and substitute for a royal sire—comes to be regarded as "the Barabbas or Son of that divine Father who generously gave His own son to die for the world." Through this immense tissue of conjectures Mr. Lang slowly makes his way with untiring zest. His wit never flags, whether he is humorously exposing the difficulty of keeping up an annual succession of kings on the throne of Babylon out of the royal family, or seriously convicting Mr. Frazer of a grave inconsistency in setting aside in vol. III. the date adopted for Sacaea in vol. II. Where it is necessary in the first passage to support the view that the mock-king at the Sacaea was slain in the character of a god of the harvest field, the testimony of Berosus which placed it in July is gladly adopted. Where it is desired in the second passage to identify Sacaea with the New Year's festival of Zakmuk, it is suddenly carried round to March.

Mr. Lang's analytical method hardly gives him scope for the display of an erudition like Mr. Frazer's. He has simply to examine a colossal fabric of guesses, take it to pieces bit by bit, and ask if any adequate evidence is offered in their support. In discussing the Sacaea, however, he is on his own field, and adduces valuable anthropological analogies for periods of licence. Students of the "cup and ring" marks will read the thirteenth essay with interest and the fresh evidence about the fire-walk in xv. should be noted.*

The valuable series known as the "Annales du Musée Guimet" continues its beneficent way and presents us with a substantial volume of 440 pages on comparative eschatology, under the title of "La Vie Future d'après le Mazdéisme," by Pastor Söderblom, of the Swedish Church in Paris.(2) The author's range is wide; his mastery of the literature of the subject is generally clear and firm; his judgment is calm and sober; and his method as exact as the nature of the materials allows. His main subject is a very careful inquiry into the doctrine of the future life in the Persian Scriptures of the Zend Avesta, and the rich Pehlevi literature which followed them. The task is not simple; for the books now composing the sacred canon are only fragments of a much larger literature; while it often happens that details no longer to be found in the extant Zend texts are reproduced in the succeeding Pehlevi. Nay, these books often contain mythological and other data belonging to the oldest stratum of Iranian thought, while their literary form is relatively late. Among these pitfalls Pastor Söderblom threads his way with admirable caution, sifting the elements, and tracing their subsequent relations and combinations with the insight of a student long familiar with his subject-matter. In the fixing of dates he exercises a wise reserve; the Gāthās, in which, like all modern scholars (save the late M. Darmsteter), he recognises the oldest literary product, being set not later than the seventh century B.C. Here and there one may desiderate a little more fulness of treatment, as in the question—too briefly touched (p. 9)—of the different terms for soul, person, &c.; or a little more precision of statement (if such greater definiteness is possible) concerning the fate of the Gentile peoples outside the range of the holy community (p. 261). When it is said, for instance, that "the good Creator, granting forgiveness and full of goodness, would not abandon any creature to the fiend" (Dâdistân, lxxv. 3), does this apply to mankind at large? Some persons are, it would seem, "abandoned to the fiend," e.g., those who "perform the rites of apostasy"; these become darting snakes, and apparently perish with the demon of the Lie when hell is burned up and the great renovation of the world takes place. Very interesting is the process by which Pastor Söderblom shows that this was originally a nature myth, wrought by the powerful ethical influence which is traditionally ascribed to the prophet Zarathustra into the grand scheme of resurrection and renewal.

Among the parallels which are collected for comparison in chap. iii. there is no mention of the conception worked out in India, by which the world's life ends by fire or by water, and a regular eschatologic doctrine is evolved to match. As Pastor Söderblom makes use of other material from the Mahābhārata, this omission is somewhat surprising. Father Dahlmann's views on Nirvāna perhaps hardly deserve the prominence assigned to them. At any rate the meaning of this much-disputed word within the sphere of Buddhism has long been clear, ever since the admirable conjecture of Professor Rhys Davids (now all but five-and-twenty years ago) was verified by the text which defines it as the "going-out" or "extinction" of the threefold fire of lust, ill-will, and delusion. The Indian comparisons hardly show Pastor Söderblom at his best.

On the much-disputed influence of Iranian thought on Hebrew eschatology, the author writes with excellent judgment and restraint. Like his Scandinavian fellow-scholar Stave, he conceives that the Jewish doctrine of the resurrection can be adequately explained without calling in a foreign cause. But he is ready to admit some amount of stimulus from contact with Persian ideas. Had he displayed some of the items of later Rabbinic teaching or popular folk-lore, such as the bands of ministering or destroying angels sent forth to meet the departed soul, or the personal judgment and the weighing of the soul's actions (apparently by Michael), a larger share might have been assigned directly or indirectly to Persian thought in developing the imaginative conceptions of Judaism.

Very significant is the last chapter of this fine book on "Eternal Life obtained by Union with God." Here are delineated the two figures—half abstract, half concrete—of Health or wholeness (almost, as we might say, perfection), and Immortality, which are the agencies of the soul's life in the future. Yet in the last resort even these fall into the background when the true goal is reached: "May we see thee, and may we, approaching, come round about thee, and attain to entire companionship with thee." In this passage ("Yasna," lx. 11) Mazdean religion utters the deathless aspiration after that fellowship of righteousness which truly constitutes "eternal life."

Mr. W. H. D. Rouse issues the fourth volume of the English translation of the "Jātaka (3)," or stories of the Buddha's former births. Here are more of those fascinating glimpses into ancient Indian life, which make this great collection so precious to the student. Here gods descend to earth, and pious kings are carried in divine chariots up to heaven. Here are the spirits of the trees whose lives are bound up with the trees which they inhabit. Here is the prince who could not be made to laugh, till a juggler brought a faint smile to his lips by the "half-body dance," while the Court fell into convulsions of amusement. Here is the young viceroy to whom his father's new consort makes advances in the style of Potiphar's wife, but as he is hurled over the Robbers' Cliff, the deity of the mountain catches and saves him, till the hour of vindication arrives. Here are the delightful animals, the elephant who cherishes his mother, the bear that teaches his fellows to outwit the tiger, the two parrots (brothers) one of which is brought up among robbers and one among sages, the golden deer, the goose which discoursed of the truth, the serpent king and the holy peacock. Here is one of the famous stories of the Buddha's self-sacrifice in a former birth—Prince Sivi who gives away his eyes to the great deity Sakka (Indra) who assumes the form of a blind old brahman to test him. Many an anecdote also is related of Gotama himself; of his forgiveness of the devices of Devadatta to injure him, and of the doom which overtook the Buddhist Judas as the earth opened and he was carried down to hell; of temptation and victory among the disciples; of sinful thoughts and the abandonment of the effort, and the way in which the Teacher revived the fading aspiration and requickened resolve. It is a strange world, where holy men pass to and fro through the air, and an outraged ascetic can prevent the sun from rising; but it is only by the sympathetic study of this class of literature that we can get to the heart of that view of Nature and life which still lives even at this day among millions of our fellow-subjects in India. Mr. Rouse is to be congratulated on the spirited character of his renderings of these ancient tales.

* By the way, Mr. Lang need not withdraw the statement that there were apprehensions of the end of the world in 1000 A.D. (p. 112, note 1, and Corrigenda). So common a book as Robertson's "History of the Christian Church," vol. II. (ed. 3), pp. 447, 558, contains ample evidence. His corrector has miscorrected him.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Where is the Piccolo?"

WHEN Queen Victoria paid her last visit to Ireland, a great gathering of school-children was arranged to take place at which the Queen was to be present, so that the boys and girls of Dublin and the country round might for once see their Queen, and ever afterwards remember the sight. They came to the place of meeting from far and near, in many hundreds, with their school-banners flying—their faces all aglow with happiness, eagerly looking for the first sight of the dear Queen, who, it was said, loved the little ones so much; and at a signal their voices broke into joyful cheers to greet her right loyally.

Of all the functions planned and carried out in her honour it was said the Queen liked the school-children's assembly the best; and, indeed, it was a spectacle which she would not easily forget. Nevertheless, some grave thoughts moved the Queen. She bore in mind, as she looked at the sunny faces of the multitude before her, that an unknown future lay before those boys and girls, who would grow up to become the workers and thinkers—the makers of the nation in time to come.

Children, you do not know how the world needs brave, true-hearted men and women, who fear God and can stand firm to the right when need comes; and it is you, boys and girls of to-day, who are to make those faithful helpers in the future. Remember this. Yet see, too, the dear Father in Heaven has given us each, whether old or young, a place in life, and every child among us has a work to do for Him which no one else can do.

Think of the characters which you boys and girls have to make for yourselves. You are learning now, in your young days, to be true to conscience, and tender-hearted and brave, and patient, and industrious. You have now, each of you, little duties to do at home, lessons to learn at school, and every day you may find chances to make some other person happy.

This is the work which God gives you to do. It is a preparation for greater work hereafter when you are men and women, and He is watching how you do it and is grieved if it is left undone. Listen to the story of the piccolo.

One evening a great concert-hall that had stood all day empty and silent began to show signs of life. The doors were unlocked and opened, here and there lights shone out in the darkness, and hurrying footsteps passed up the creaking stairs to the stage-doors through which numbers of men and boys entered, and took their places in a great semi-circle.

Then followed a tuning of instruments. This did not last long, however; for, in a few minutes the famous conductor, Sir Michael Costa, stood in front of the stage ready to conduct the rehearsal which was to take place that night, and at a sign from him the first notes of the grand symphony about to be performed were heard. Do you know how wonderful it is to watch the different players in a band, each one in that great company playing the part assigned to him, intently watching every wave of the conductor's wand?

On this occasion, the stage seemed all alive with the quick movements of the performers, and a flood of music filled the hall; when, suddenly, Sir Michael gave the signal for silence, and, immediately, the well-trained musicians obeyed. The bows of the stringed instruments were suspended in mid-air, the drums were hushed, the harps and wind instruments were dumb, and, in the perfect stillness, his voice was heard to say, "Where is the piccolo?" The ear of the great musician had missed the smallest instrument in the band.

Boys and girls, do you see the meaning which this story has for you?

Brute beasts . . . cannot have any rights . . . They are of the number of things. We have no duties to them—not of justice, . . . not of religion. . . . We have then no duties of charity, nor duties of any kind towards the lower animals.—Moral Philosophy.

THE day has waned, the chase is stern and long,
Hush'd the pack's music, hush'd the hunter's song,
But one staunch hound still struggles on the scent,
A horseman follows, dusty, hot, and spent—
One effort more, for see! the game is near.
Urge the spent steed with whip and spur and cheer.
How grandly rear those antlers to his sight!
But what is that? A strange ethereal light
Beams from a cross between those antlers broad,
And awe-struck Hubert kneels before his Lord.

A legend is it? Yes, its meaning read—
The cross should hallow more than human need,
Nor only human anguish sacred be—
The dumb brute's sob, a solemn litany
Appeals to kindly heaven, and not in vain.
The whole creation travaileth in pain,
Waiting redemption in the throes of birth,
Waiting to bring the happier era forth,
Waiting expectant for the brighter day
When Power to Love shall yield unquestioned sway:
When He by many a name adored confess'd
Redeemer, Better Nature, Heavenly Guest
Shall rule in all, and God be manifest.

RELIGION IN INDIA.

THREE years ago the Rev. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS went out to India as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, following in the footsteps of other friendly messengers, to carry the sympathy of our people to the liberal religious workers of that great country, and particularly to the members of the Brahmo Somaj, with whom our ties of spiritual kinship have been of recent years so closely drawn. In the spring of this year Mr. WILLIAMS returned, unhappily in broken health, but with a record of devoted work and distinguished service rendered, through a longer period and with ampler results than had hitherto been achieved, and bearing with him tokens of high regard and warm friendship received from brethren in various parts of India.

A report of his experiences and work we had hoped that Mr. WILLIAMS would personally present to the Council Meeting held last Wednesday, and that we might then have accorded to him at a social meeting a warm welcome home, and some united expression of our gratitude for his accomplished work. And it is with the deepest regret that we have been obliged to recognise that the state of Mr. WILLIAMS's health made it impossible to hold such a meeting, and that the report must be presented in his absence. A resolution of thanks and sympathy was passed by the Council, as will be seen from our record of the meeting, and Mr. WILLIAMS's most interesting and valuable report is here printed in full. It is not a mere chronicle of the successive stages of his work, but what is of far more permanent value, a record of the conclusions to which a thoughtful and sympathetic mind has been brought by a wide and varied experience in regard to the present conditions and prospects of religion in India.

It was in October, 1898, that Mr. WILLIAMS landed in Bombay, when, owing to the prevalence of the plague, he proceeded straight to Madras. There his first months of service were spent, until in January, 1899, he came for the first time to Calcutta. In April he was in Assam and visited the Unitarian communities in the Khasi hills, returning in June to Calcutta. Through that hot summer he remained at his post, in November paying a visit to East Bengal. December saw him again at Madras, and then on the west coast at Calicut. Early in 1900, prostrated by the great heat, he was obliged to return to Madras for rest, and thence to Calcutta, and in April he went up to the hills and spent three months at Darjeeling, at work, while seeking new vigour and refreshment in that high station. Returning to Calcutta in July the Albert Hall services were commenced, of which the report gives so interesting an account. In October Agra, Lucknow, and other cities of the North-Western Provinces were visited, and then the steady winter's work in Calcutta was resumed, until in March of the present year failing strength compelled Mr. WILLIAMS to relinquish the Albert Hall services, and on April 30 he sailed for home. This bare outline is sufficient to show how wide was the field of Mr. WILLIAMS's labours, and the record which we were able to publish from time to time during those two years and a-half of his active service has borne witness to the admirable efficiency and happy readiness with which Mr. WILLIAMS adapted himself to the needs of his hearers, as a minister of religion, the exponent of a pure, spiritual faith, a lecturer on theological and literary subjects, and as a friend, devoted with singleness of heart to the welfare of the people among whom he had come.

We do not attempt here any summary of Mr. WILLIAMS's report, but ask rather that the whole may be carefully read. India, as he says, is a fascinating and mysterious country. It is a country towards which, with its immense population, our nation has assumed the gravest responsibilities, and amid its overwhelming problems no question can be more vital than that of the progress of religion. The appeal for justice in British rule, and pity in time of famine, cannot indeed be too strongly urged, but we ask especially for an earnest consideration of what Mr. WILLIAMS says in his report as to the mingled good and evil of the impact of Western thought upon the Eastern mind, with its temporary impoverishment of spiritual life, and the call which thus comes to us to strengthen by every means in our power the hands and hearts of our Indian brethren who are labouring both for the social and spiritual advancement of their people.

Mr. WILLIAMS has rendered in this cause eminent service, and, as we now sorrowfully find, has made a great sacrifice, which commands our admiration and heartfelt sympathy. In his serious illness he must be sustained by the deep and thankful sense of work well done, of faith confirmed and ties of friendship strengthened, which must be fruitful of the highest good.

EXPERIENCES AND WORK IN INDIA, AS THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.*

BY THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

I AM deeply indebted to the Association for a visit to, perhaps, the most fascinating and the most mysterious country on the face of the globe. India is fascinating in its chequered history, in the remains of its ancient splendour, in the variety of its races and peoples, in its social manners and customs. It is impossible to define the endless spell which it exercises upon you. India is mysterious in the supreme difficulty of penetrating to its innermost life. The Hindu does not wear his heart upon his sleeve. He cherishes it as a sacred treasure to be preserved from prying eyes. He ascends to mystic heights and descends to mystic depths. His religion is to be alone with God. His most precious and enraptured moments are those in which all externalisms turn into the vain shows of things, and he becomes absorbed in the Infinite Spirit. His soul is a book in which there are chapters unreadable by the practical European—a kingdom of peace and quietude untravelled and unexplored by the busy and restless Englishman. It is only he who scampers through the country in a few weeks who imagines that he has probed the mind and heart of India. A long residence destroys this superficial illusion, and creates and deepens the conviction that the recesses of the Hindu's soul are hidden from view—that he has meat to eat which his Western brother knows not of.

I do not claim to speak with anything even approaching to perfect knowledge. I limit these observations strictly to my own personal experiences and impressions, and as such they are necessarily inadequate and fragmentary. But I do claim, honestly and earnestly, to give them to you entirely free from English prejudices and prepossessions. I went to India with the determination to see those phases of thought and life with which I should come in contact, not from the European but from the Indian point of view; and to estimate them, not on the basis of what they might seem to be to a European Christian, but on the basis of what they are to an Asiatic Theist. As I wish Christianity to be judged by its best and not by its worst, by its purity and not by its adulterations, so I wished to judge of aspects of religion in India by their highest not their lowest side, by their strength not their weakness, by their essence not their excrescences. These notes, then, spring out of that way of looking at some of the features of religion in India; and whether you agree with them or not, I say that they are the expression of a free and unbiassed mind.

* Report presented to a meeting of the Council of the Association at Essex Hall, on Wednesday Oct. 30.

Work—Educational and Religious.

My work was mainly of a religious kind in co-operation with our Brahmo friends. Besides sermons and theological lectures it consisted of contributions on theological and religious subjects to the Brahmo papers, to the Hindu of Madras, to the Indian Mirror of Calcutta, and to the Theistic Light of Calicut. In addition, I wrote literary articles in the Brahmo papers, and in the Calcutta University Magazine. I also gave lectures of a literary character. In Madras and Calcutta, in Dacca, Shillong, and Darjeeling, in the North-West Provinces, and in Behar, these lectures brought large audiences of students and members of the educated native communities, with a few Europeans. Several of them furnished opportunities for presenting the principles of Liberal Religion, as you will at once see when I mention the subjects — Wordsworth, Carlyle, Emerson, Matthew Arnold, Tennyson, Dickens, Charles Kingsley. I was told again and again that they provided a better medium for sowing the seeds of Liberal Religious ideas, and for approaching and impressing the minds of thoughtful and enquiring young men than directly doctrinal discourses.

The Need and Opportunity for Liberal Religion in India.

But, after all, the principal interest of your Representative was in his attempts to further the cause of Liberal Religion, which in India is known as Brahmoism, in England as Unitarianism. For this purpose India offers to theologians of large mind, and all-embracing sympathies, and heart kindled with the prophet's fire, an open door. It is a commonplace observation, heard everywhere, that India, like England, is religiously in a state of transition. Western education has brought with it rich benefits, but it has not been an unqualified good. If it has enriched the mind of India, it has impoverished its soul. If it has opened the eyes of India to a wider world, it has dimmed the vision and the faculty divine which have been India's spiritual strength and glory. It has conferred gains and inflicted losses. One result has been that it has broken up and destroyed the village and district classes which were under the personal direction and tuition of the old and now dying race of Pundits whose influence was moral and spiritual as well as intellectual, whose aim was to form character as well as impart knowledge. These centres of training, where the Pundits were as fathers to their pupils, have disappeared under the extension of the collegiate system. The aspiring and ambitious youths of India, instead of coming in their own localities under the power of immediate personal intercourse with those who were both religious guides and intellectual preceptors, now flock to the colleges in the principal towns. With the exception of those colleges which are in the hands of the Christian Missionary Societies, the teaching in these institutions is purely secular. It is given by professors who have no personal relations with the students, and whose dominating aim is to prepare their pupils to pass the University examinations, success here being the gate to Government employment and to the learned professions. The Indian Government is necessarily pledged to a position of neutrality with regard to religion. Accordingly, the Government colleges are non-religious. The curriculum makes no provision for the inculcation of those principles which lie at the basis of human character, and without which life is halt, and lame, and blind. I am not aware that the Home supplies what the Government colleges omit; and I am certain that the vast majority of Indian youths are untouched, and will remain untouched, by the dogmatic Christian churches.

A Temporary Lack of Faith.

What is the present result of this state of things? It is that young India has departed from the ancient faith. It has been loosened from its old moorings, and is away out at sea, without rudder, compass, or anchor. It is drifting—whither? Away from harbourage, at any rate. It is, to change the figure, wandering in the desolate land of Nowhere. In this condition it is apt to conclude that it has outgrown religion. To it enlightenment and faith cannot co-exist. Faith belongs to an age of ignorance. Culture leaves religion behind as a phase of mental infancy. This is to-day's attitude of young India towards religion. It adheres to old forms, rites, and ceremonies; but it has lost the soul, the vitalising power of religion. It takes great care of the shell—of observances—but the kernel has becomed unpalatable to a cultured taste.

Orthodox Christianity will not Avail.

It is totally against human experience in the history not only of India but of the human race that this attitude should be permanent. It will prove in the East as in the West that men "may rise on stepping stones of their dead selves to higher things." But in the meantime what is being done to meet the immediate need? Christianity does not meet it. Christianity in India means orthodox or Trinitarian Christianity. In this sense Christianity is not likely to become the religion of India. After generations of missionary effort on the part of Baptists, Wesleyans, the Church of England, the Presbyterians, the American Episcopal Methodists, the converts are a mere handful among the three hundred millions of people who inhabit the land. A large number, perhaps the largest number, of these have been gathered within the folds of the Christian churches by the help given to them in times of distress. They are described throughout India as "famine Christians." It would be unjust to deny that there are instances of genuine conversion; but they are few and far between. Even the young men who pass through Christian colleges and graduate from these remain outside the Christian churches. There is a great wall of separation between studentship in a Christian college, and affiliation with a Christian church. I suppose that "the Christian College" of Madras—the most famous and the most successful of all the Christian colleges in India—has seen thousands of students in its classes during the thirty-five years of its existence, and has on its roll the largest total of the graduates of the Madras University; but the number of those who have become Christians is the merest fraction of the whole. Once every year former students assemble in the College from all parts of the Madras Presidency, with the present students, to do honour to its justly revered Founder and Principal—the venerable the Rev. Dr. Miller. They have all received instruction in Christianity, but they are still Hindus and not Christians. Several of the Madras Brahmos are Christian College trained men. The orthodox interpretation of Christianity fails to find lodgment in the minds of cultivated natives.

Beneficent Work of Orthodox Christians.

But the representatives of orthodox Christianity have done, and are doing, beneficent service in India. The most orthodox Hindu will gladly and appreciatingly acknowledge the blessings they are conferring on his country. In education, in philanthropy, in deeds of mercy, they exemplify and enact, in unstinted and ever-increasing measure, the gospel of humanity. To them India owes her first introduction to the treasures of Western literature. To them she owes companies of men and women who, for the love of God and His Christ, spend themselves on the sick and suffering, on the poor and needy. To them she owes bands of Christ-like souls who respond to the cry of the lonely and destitute, and whose hands are swift to aid without distinction of race, creed, or colour. It was from among their ranks that several missionaries and nurses, like their Lord and Master, yielded up their lives through their self-forgetting and self-consuming devotion to the famine-stricken in the Central Provinces last year. God be thanked for the richness and the helpfulness of the hearts and hands of such men and women! It is in such ways as these that Christianity commends itself in India. In its theological forms it awakens no answering chord in the soul of the Hindu: as a spirit of service and of love it enters his heart, and proves its affinity with what is best and highest in his own religion.

Revival of Vedantism.

There is the revival of Vedantism. But the renewed investigation into Vedantism does not apparently extend beyond the limits of a few enthusiastic students. The most eloquent present-day expounder of Vedantism is Vivikananda; but Vivikananda's warmest admirers would hardly maintain that he has stamped on India either his doctrines or his personality. Yet if Vedantism won general acceptance it would not be a force making against Liberal Religion. As I read it—it is capable of a variety of interpretations—Vedantism is by no means incompatible with Brahmoism. On the contrary, they may dwell together in peace and concord. But I see no sufficient evidence that any one conception and interpretation of Vedantism is destined to become the sovereign religion of India.

Mrs. Besant's Movement.

There is the movement originated, headed, and propagated throughout India by Mrs. Annie Besant with untiring vigour and charm of manner—a movement which counts, for the time being, as an important factor in religion in the East. If this were a frank effort to free Hinduism from its accumulated mass of corruptions and superstitions, and to restore it to its original purity, it might be a radical and life-giving reformation. It might then be a power of regeneration, remaking Hinduism after its original fashion, and clothing it with the light with which heaven first kindled it, as with a garment. It is, however, a compromise with Hinduism as it is, a tolerance of its proved evils and adulterations, in the hope that by insistence on its everlasting verities the fittest will ultimately survive. I have no doubt that Mrs. Besant earnestly desires to breathe the breath of life into the best but decadent elements of Hinduism, and to make her movement a powerful contribution to the spiritual life of India; but I honestly believe that, in the policy which has hitherto marked it, it has been a set-back and not a stimulus to the highest life of India. Whatever power attends it is due to the undeniable potency of Mrs. Besant's personality. When that ceases to operate its vitality will be gone.

Brahmoism.

These are among the forces at work in the realm of religion in India, from orthodox Christianity on the one side to Mrs. Besant's movement on the other. Between these stands Brahmoism, distinct from each and all, having a mission of its own, seeking to differentiate between what is permanent and what transient, what universal and what local in all religions, and out of the eternal constituents aiming to establish the universal religion.

A Universal Theistic Faith.

What is Brahmoism? It is essentially a theistic religion. It is not exclusive, self-sufficient, and denominational. It finds its sources and inspiration of truth in every system of faith. It claims a common share with all mankind in those incontrovertible tests by which the dispensations of Providence in the material as well as in the spiritual world have been proved and accepted by all who sought for salvation. Thankfully accepting many most sacred truths from other systems of belief it would be essentially contradictory to the catholic character of its creed if it neglected the tests and credentials which those systems furnish for the truths so supplied. It would be a denial of God as the Father of Truth, who hears the cry of every truth-seeker, whatever his creed or country, if in welcoming the revelations of His Spirit through different sources, it welcomed not also the internal and external testimony which those revelations bring with them. Its great object is therefore to establish that communion of faith, partial at present, far from complete, which shall pervade the religious consciousness of all men. Standing on the simplest foundation, simple but eternal, simple and undoubted as God's great fatherhood and the law of love among men, Brahmoism knocks at the door of every religious system, learns and admires the grand discoveries of truth made in it, and stores up all for the universal church of the future. Doctrinally it affirms the unity and primary attributes of God as manifested in all creation, and in all conscious contemplation of His nature: it affirms the divine origin and eternal responsibilities of man: it lays between God and man that law of progress which extends through all eternity: it affirms that the Soul may come direct to God and see Him face to face without mediator or intercessor: it affirms that salvation consists in purity of heart and righteousness of life: it affirms that repentance and amendment and not reliance on the merits of others are the conditions of God's forgiveness of the sinner: it affirms that the worship of God is the soul's health: and it affirms that after the process called death the Soul will for ever dwell with the Supreme Soul in a continuously ascending life.

Making for Social Reform.

Brahmoism also involves social reform. Its adherents have been taught by Rajah Rammohun Roy, by Maharshi Devendernath Tagore, by Keshub Chunder Sen, to think that their salvation cannot be separated from the salvation of those with whom their destinies are cast together. Hence they have devised and adopted measures for the improvement of the community in the matter of child-marriage, the remarriage of widows, the education of woman, the free social intercourse of men and women. But above and beyond all else the Brahmo believes that amidst warring ideas and antagonistic creeds there is in every true and humble religious heart an essential harmony of thought and principle, a heavenly confraternity of the highest relations, which has been the revelation of God at all times. Thus there is one current of spirituality encircling the world of souls, and the Brahmo's views of God and man tend to deepen that current.

Brahmoism India's Deepest Need.

I shall no doubt be considered partial alike by orthodox Christians and orthodox Hindus, but it is my earnest conviction that the faith of Brahmoism is India's deepest need. Is it operative? None can read the history connected with the great Reformers whose names I have mentioned, and doubt that it has proved a savour of life unto life. Its influence is not to be measured by the number of its actual adherents, or by a count of its organised societies. These may seem insignificant in the midst of India's vast population. But it would be a mistake to assume that its power is limited within its own prayer-halls, or churches, or institutions. It has permeated, and is permeating, masses of the community who do not come within its walls, and who would not accept its name. I am stating only the simple truth when I say that, as with Unitarianism in England, so with Brahmoism in India, there are more Brahmos outside of Brahmo organisations than within them. Its truths have told far and wide. I have met with Hindus upon Hindus who have unhesitatingly confessed they were Brahmos in faith, but that they remained within the Hindu community for the sake of two or three ceremonies which they could not abandon. Brahmoism is gradually pervading India like leaven. I believe with heart and soul that it is destined to inherit the land. Will it propagate itself as a great organisation? I do not know. I am not so deeply concerned for its future as a society. But of its future as a faith I have no more doubt than I have of the dawn of day to-morrow morning. Wherever I went I learned, even more than Brahmos themselves could learn, that it is slowly winning its way from mind to mind, circulating from soul to soul. Its seed is spreading and germinating, and into whatever granary the harvest will be gathered, the harvest will be there.

Obstacles to its Growth.

What retards the growth of Brahmoism as an institution? One cause is external to itself. It is the increasing elasticity of Hinduism. Theologically, Hinduism has become comprehensive, and embraces almost every variety of opinion from orthodox Hinduism to Agnosticism. It is asserted by native writers of authority that Hinduism has become a term for social observances rather than for a religion, and that one may hold any religious or theological faith and still be a good Hindu if only he practice two or three social rites and ceremonies. Brahmoism finds that this growing expansiveness of Hinduism to all sorts of opinions tells against the augmentation of its numbers, while surrender to certain forms avoids the domestic and social penalties of joining a Brahmo Church.

Internal Divisions.

Other causes are internal. The chief, perhaps, are the divisions among the Brahmos themselves. It is painful to me to think of these severances and alienations, and it would cut me to the quick to dwell upon them; but that they weaken the power of Brahmoism and bring upon it scoff and reproach who can doubt? I can only hope and pray that as the Unitarians of England and America have learned to co-operate in organisations for the common cause, in spite of differences of opinion as marked and as wide as those which set up the Brahmos of India into apparently irreconcilable sections, so their brethren of the East may learn to join heart and hand and present a united front against every form of evil.

Too Speculative.

Another cause is the tendency to over-speculation—a tendency which is apt to mistake the philosophy of religion for religion itself. One of the first things one notices among our Brahmo friends is a great fondness for discussing abstract questions—questions which have puzzled all the ages, and the consideration of which does not produce any marked results on the soul or on the activities of life. I do not by any means discard the necessity of a philosophy of religion, and of a theology, but in the pursuit of the religious life we much more require that which satisfies the soul. Our Brahmo friends know better than we Westerners do what it is to retire within the folds of their own being, and to behold everything there by the light which heaven kindles in the bosom of every earnest worshipper. If any word of mine has weight with them I would venture to counsel them to emphasise more and more this aspect of Theism—the immortal blessedness of God's near Presence in daily life; to accentuate the spirituality of religion, and concentrate themselves more and more on the spiritual growth of man. With the light kindled in the inner nature, with the spiritual nature receiving its proper support and nourishment, the functions of the mind are never at a loss to find their object and exercise.

Methods of Help from England.

Holding these views of Brahmoism and its future I believe that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is doing a most useful and beneficent work in aiding the Brahmo movement. I should strongly deprecate any attempt to establish distinctively Unitarian congregations in India. I would continue to give liberal help to the Unitarian Mission in the Khasi Hills. That was a spontaneous movement. It was not thrust upon the Khasi people from outside. It sprang up on the soil. It was started by two Khasi men who, able to read and speak English, were inspired by reading some American Unitarian literature circulated by the Rev. A. H. Dall, of Calcutta. But beyond giving generous support to this Khasi Unitarian Mission I would not go. Brahmoism is indigenous, and it has some features peculiar to itself which Unitarianism does not possess, while it has affinities with Unitarianism which should bring the representatives of the two faiths into the closest relations of amity with each other. At present there are three forms of aid gladly given by this Association—the Brahmo scholarship at Manchester College, the sending out of an English minister to work with the Brahmo Samaj, and the free distribution of Unitarian and other liberal religious literature. Of these three forms the first-named is, perhaps, the most important. Helpful as the visits of English ministers may be, they are not so helpful as a body of men who spend two years in increasing their theological equipment at Manchester College, and then return to speak out of their fuller and richer resources to the people in the tongue wherein they were born. Given a number of such men, with cultured minds and sanctified souls, with the solemn strains of truth sung from Heaven in their ears, and they, using native speech, would deliver their message with far more effect than a foreigner employing an alien language. I should be basely ungrateful if I left in your minds any shadow of doubt as to the kindliness and the geniality with which I was everywhere received. It was pleasant to be assured by Brahmo friends that the voice of an Englishman, discoursing on religion, reached classes of people who would not be found within a Brahmo Mandir. But still I have no doubt that a native enriched with mental wealth as well as gifted with the spirit, speaking in a vernacular from the depths of a soul hallowed with sacred fire, would penetrate to the holy of holies, where a European would but enter the outer courts of the heart's temple. The Brahmo scholarship, wisely used, is a contribution towards preparing such men for their ministry. Such men are wanted everywhere, and nowhere more than in the Madras Presidency, where there is not a single Brahmo missionary, where services are carried on in Madras, Calicut, Mangalore, Coimbatore, Masulipatam, Rajamundry, Bezwada, Coranada, and elsewhere, by zealous laymen who keep their hands to the plough amidst at thousand discouragements.

Hopeful Prospects of the Liberal Faith.

I have said or implied that India offers a splendid field for the propagation of liberal religion. I do not mean that India is prepared for what our orthodox Christian friends would call "instantaneous conversion" to liberal religion. I mean that a large proportion of her educated sons are prepared to listen to a broad, unsectarian, catholic presentation of religion.

A Record of Personal Experience.

I have formed this opinion out of my own experiences. I am open to the charge of egotism in referring to those experiences, but I must refer to them in this connection. At Madras, where I began, the Sunday evening congregations, which filled the Mandir and its verandah during my three months' stay, consisted of Brahmos, Hindus, Mahommedans, and native Christians. Literature was in great demand every Sunday evening, and the tracts and pamphlets sent out by this Association to the Madras Samaj were eagerly taken away. At a religious address the Victoria Hall was crowded with an audience of 1,500, which included every type of religious thought. On a second visit to the south a course of eight or nine religious lectures was given at Calicut, on the Malabar coast. The Jubilee Town Hall, which seats about 600, was occupied to the full every night, the audience being composed of natives of all classes, with a number of Europeans. The German Basel Mission authorities kindly and voluntarily placed the large hall of their school at our disposal for the Sunday evening service—a friendly act which would not have been offered or granted in Calcutta or Madras. It was remarked by the West Coast Spectator that the meetings had aroused in Calicut a religious interest unknown in the town within living memory. At Shillong the Brahmo Samaj Prayer Hall witnessed large gatherings of natives belonging to several religions, with a number of European ladies and gentlemen. It was the same at Bhowanipur, a suburb of Calcutta, where two courses of ten or twelve Sunday evening lectures filled the South Suburban School with men of various religions. It was the same in some measure at Barisal, in a large measure at Dacca. It was so at Agra, Lucknow, and Allahabad, and eminently so at Bankipur, in Behar, where Brahmos, Hindus, Mahommedans, native Christians assembled, to the number of four and five hundred, in the Government College and in the Mahommedan College; and, in addition, a number of European ladies and gentlemen, the official element being well represented.

Religious Services in Calcutta.

But perhaps the most interesting experience, because it extended over a longer period, was at Calcutta. During a second visit, a Brahmo Committee, at the initiative of Dr. P. K. Ray, arranged for a religious service on the Sunday morning in the Albert Hall, to be conducted by your Representative. It was an experiment, and it justified the hopes of its promoters. For several months there was every Sunday morning a congregation in which Brahmos of all sections joined, and along with them Brahmins, Mahommedans, native Christians, and men who in England are called "free lances." These all united as one body. Its intellectual character was sufficiently attested by the fact that there were barristers, vakils, doctors, scientists, college professors, and students, with a few ladies, most of them graduates of Calcutta University. It averaged about two hundred. It was described in Calcutta newspapers as "a unique congregation," and it was characterised by earnestness and devotion. It proved that men of different and divergent theologies could find a common bond of worship. Whether it could and would have been established into a permanent congregation I hesitate to say. Unhappily, with my sudden collapse in health, it was disbanded. But as far as it went—a promiscuous gathering every Sunday morning of men of various races and creeds—it gave evidence that among the educated constituency of India there are those who are ready to form the beginnings of what might eventuate in a National Church—not the Church of a sect or a party, but, in one of St. Paul's favourite phrases, a Church of the Living God. This is the ideal of Brahmoism; and if it were true to this ideal, if all its administration were moulded in harmony with this largeness of aim, if its spirit were always on this high elevation, it would fulfil its inherent possibility of being the builder and maker of such a kingdom of God. But, like all ideals, it suffers from an admixture of human infirmities, and proves less broad than its high theoretical purposes. Still, I look for its high purposes to become again supreme, as they once were, when Brahmoism went on its conquering way; and it is in co-operating with it to this end that your Representative can do his best work. The Calcutta Albert Hall congregation showed what might be done, and gave the promise of the Church of Humanity.

Opportunities for Further Help.

This Association has opened up relations with the Brahmos of India which are worthy of the largest support. As richer funds come into the exchequer, these relations may be manifested in more than the three directions to which they are now confined. But the forms of aid are not so important as the spirit out of which they are born. That spirit has existed between the Liberal Thinkers of the West and those of the East from the time of the Rajah Rammohun Roy. It grew during the visit of Keshub Chunder Sen. It has increased during a more recent period. It has not advanced to full proportion. It is capable of deepening and enrichment. It is a spirit of fraternity, a spirit of sympathetic imagination, with a due regard to the special characteristics of Unitarianism and Brahmoism. It is not exclusive but inclusive. It aims at promoting unity with diversity. It is to the development of this spirit that the visits of English ministers will prove to be valuable contributions. They will form links of communion between East and West. They will bind heart to heart and soul to soul over leagues of land and sea as nothing else can. Sermons and lectures will be listened to and appreciated, but it is the personal association, animated by brotherliness, saturated by feelings of goodwill, which will be most effective in enabling East and West to realise that beneath all external diversities, underlying all modes of thought and fashions of worship, there beats one human heart—that men of every name and clime and colour are of one divine kith and kin, one family of the one God and Father of us all.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council was held on Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 30, at Essex Hall, Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., president, in the chair, when there were also present the Rev. F. Allen, Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Mr. H. Blessley, Mr. G. W. Brown, Miss Burkitt, Mr. G. Callow, the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., the Rev. G. Carter, Mr. G. W. Chitty, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. P. W. Clayden, the Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Mr. H. Epps, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. J. Harrison, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., Miss F. Hill, the Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A., the Rev. Dr. Klein, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Miss Lawrence, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. H. Lupton, Miss M. Martineau, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mrs. E. L. Morton, Mr. J. G. Pinnock, Mr. F. Pinnock, the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, Miss Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Miss M. Pritchard, the Rev. Lawrence Scott, Miss E. Sharpe, Mr. W. Spiller, the Rev. F. W. Stanley, the Rev. J. E. Stronge, Mr. J. Sudbery, Miss Tagart, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler, Miss Teschemacher, Mr. E. C. Thurgood, Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart., Mr. T. Pallister Young, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the secretary.

The Minutes of the Council meeting on April 16 having been read and confirmed, the PRESIDENT acknowledged the honour of his election and expressed his strong conviction of the need of their work, and especially of strong affirmative teaching of Unitarianism.

The SECRETARY then read the report of the Executive Committee, with a full record of the progress of the Association's work since the last meeting of the Council. As we publish this week the special report of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams on his work in India, we are obliged to hold over the Committee's Report, which will appear in full in our next week's issue.

The report having been read several questions arising out of it were asked, and Miss M. PRITCHARD mentioned the pleasant experience of the Misses Turner in their recent visit to New Zealand, where they found the congregation at Aukland full of enthusiasm for the work, and more than satisfied in having secured the services of the Rev. W. Jellie.

Miss E. SHARPE repeated her question, whether something could not be done in West and South London as in the North to display Unitarian literature in a shop-window.

The PRESIDENT read a letter from the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who was absent in Holland, attending the meetings of the Protestantenbond at Utrecht, expressing his great regret that he could not be present to urge the greatness of their opportunities and responsibilities in reference to Unitarianism and Liberal Religion in the Scandinavian countries generally. Of this Mr. Armstrong wrote :—

> A great awakening is there in active process, and it is, I am persuaded, such a view of religion as we can present that alone has the hope of laying hold of the spiritual life of these peoples and saving it from a purely critical Agnosticism. My own immediate knowledge and interest concerns Denmark, where it is absolutely necessary to help our friends to put all possible strength and effectiveness into Lys over Landet, their weekly organ. It ought to be made a power throughout Scandinavia, and might be so if we challenged it to put forth its strength by such regular and substantial pecuniary support as the Association over which you preside is well able to provide. But Norway and Sweden also, I am persuaded, are ripe for our action. These peoples constitute one of the noblest stocks on the face of the earth, and to imbue them with Liberal Christianity would be a long and splendid step towards the conquest of the world. Cannot we have a special Scandinavian Committee, with instructions to acquire all possible information, both by correspondence and by visitation, and to take whatever measures may prove most practical for the spread of our Gospel among these populations ?

The SECRETARY pointed out that a grant of £10 had been made for the support of Lys over Landet, and the Committee would watch for every opportunity of service in those countries.

On the motion of the Rev. J. HARWOOD, seconded by Mr. P. W. CLAYDEN, a resolution was passed, warmly acknowledging the services of Mr. Harry Rawson, J.P., of Manchester, as local treasurer for over forty years, and referring with sympathy and good wishes to his retirement from that office.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD also reported as to the International Council meetings in Whit-week, particularly dwelling on the evidences he had since found in different parts of the country of the stimulus derived from those delightful meetings.

The SECRETARY reported as to the effort made to secure through the District Associations a record of chapel endowments, Miss Tagart once more emphasising the importance of knowing who were the trustees of various endowments. There were trusts hanging on a single life, which ought to be attended to. Endowments had been lost or diverted from their proper use simply through lapse of trustees and inattention to this matter.

The PRESIDENT then expressed their great regret that the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams was not well enough to be present as they had hoped, to present a report as to his work in India, and to be welcomed home at the special meeting they had planned; but he had prepared a full and valuable report which would be presented by the Rev. V. D. Davis, chairman of the Indian Sub-committee.

The President being obliged to leave, the chair was taken by Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE, and Mr. DAVIS presented the report, which is printed in full in our present issue, giving an abstract of it, and joining on behalf of the Indian Committee in the President's expression of sympathy with Mr. Williams in his illness and regret at his absence.

It was then moved from the Chair :—

> That the Council offers its sincere congratulations to the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams on the successful work which he accomplished during his residence in India as the representative of the Association, and in welcoming him home again to England, places on record its great indebtedness to him for his unwearied labours on behalf of Liberal religion, and conveys to him its deep sympathy in his prolonged and serious illness.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD seconded the resolution, and from his own experience in India agreed entirely with the conclusions to which Mr. Williams had been brought by his fuller knowledge. They had been most fortunate in their representative, and he had learned from correspondents in different parts of India how very warmly Mr. Williams's sympathy had been appreciated, and how effective the personal influence he had exerted.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER supported the resolution, with cordial appreciation of the work done by Mr. Williams, and especially of the value of the personal friendship by which he had drawn together workers in different parts of India. As to the presence of students at Manchester College, Oxford, he thought that should still be regarded as an experiment, for they had not yet enough experience to be sure that the result of two years under conditions, so entirely different from those from which they came, and in which their life-work must be done, would be as a general rule beneficial to the students.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

The SECRETARY presented a report from the Rev. T. Dunkerley on the recent visit to Hungary, in which he had taken part as representative of the Association, and Miss Tagart gave a report on the same subject.

Miss TAGART explained how the opening of the New College buildings at Kolozsvar had been postponed, and, therefore, to their regret the English visitors were unable to be present; but they inspected the buildings which overtopped the surrounding houses and could be seen from most parts of the town. There was accommodation for the residence of students, as well as class rooms, and in the centre was a hall of meeting, adorned with medallions of the succession of Unitarian bishops. When her father went to Hungary, it was to save the old college for the Unitarians; now the need was to provide for more students and divinity professors. There was a great movement in that country towards Liberal Protestantism, and there were whole communities needing ministers. They had been greatly impressed by the personality of Bishop Ferencz, and it was gratifying to see the place taken by the Hungarians who had studied at Manchester College. There were great claims on the Unitarian ministers in Hungary, which they met with exemplary devotion. The Los von Rom movement throughout Austria was most striking, and the Unitarians had a great opportunity. They should be earnestly sustained in their work.

A resolution of thanks to Mr. Dunkerley and Miss Tagart for their reports, moved from the CHAIR, and seconded by Miss M. PRITCHARD, was unanimously passed.

The Rev. LAWRENCE SCOTT asked leave, as a matter of urgency, to bring forward the subject of the dreadful mortality of the children in the Concentration Camps of South Africa, to England's shame, a subject which at no meeting of Christian people ought to be overlooked; but the Chairman, while expressing his full agreement with Mr. Scott's feeling in the matter, ruled that as no notice had been given, and so many members had already left the meeting, he could not submit the question of urgency, and the meeting therefore terminated.

AN ITALIAN BOOK.

SIR,—Will you kindly tell your readers from me that in the excellent paper of our friend, the Rev. Tony André, read in the late International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, much more merit than I deserve is given to me, as publisher of a truly valuable hand-book of Religious History for the use of schools and families?

The hand-book in question was published at the expenses of my venerated and beloved old friend, the Rev. Henry Paira, D.D., pastor of the Swiss Protestant Church in Milan. It was the labour of love of his worthy daughter Fanny—alas! called too soon from this lower world to the blessed company of other saints and angels! My share in that publication was mainly confined to the literary revision of the Italian.

With loving remembrances to yourself and all who have ever been so kind to me in London,

FERDINANDO BRACCIFORTI.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—At the last meeting of the Guild the subject of conversation among the young people themselves was "The Leadership of Jesus," and the ideas expressed or quoted were both spiritual, sensible, and practical. At the previous meeting the subject was "What can we Young People do for our Chapel?" In the course of the conversation the following points were enunciated and illustrated:—(1) We can become members of the chapel; (2) we can regularly attend its services; (3) we can join heartily in the services; (4) we can help to make strangers feel at home when they come into our chapel; (5) we can, by punctual and regular attendance at the Sunday-school, and by a willingness to work for it and our other institutions, considerably help the chapel; and (6) we can by our daily life among others aim to be worthy of the religion for which our chapel stands. The Rev. J. J. Wright has handed to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association a legacy of £100, left by the late Mr. Richard Aldred, spindle maker, and a member of the above chapel. Mr. Aldred died in 1892, and ordered his subscription of 10s. a year to be continued to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association until his executors, Mr. James Cowsill and the late Mr. William Unsworth, had completed certain arrangements provided in connection with Mr. Aldred's little property. A plain homely man, whose every penny was the result of hard work and thrift, Mr. Aldred was devoted to his chapel and to the Unitarian cause.

Brighton.—Services in commemoration of Alfred the Great were held on Sunday, 27th ult. The Rev. H. M. Livens preached in the morning, and Mr. G. J. Holyoake gave an interesting address in the evening, not omitting to point the moral to recent events. At the close of the service a resolution was carried unanimously, imploring the pity of Lord Salisbury for the men, women, and children in the Concentration Camps in South Africa. The congregations were good, and the amount of £9 12s. 5d. was collected for the medical charities of the town.

Croydon.—"Citizen Sunday" was marked by three services in the Free Christian Church, conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. In the morning the discourses for the day were introduced by the question, "Am I my Brother's Keeper?" In the evening the subject was, "Why should we be good Citizens?" But in the afternoon the great event of the day occurred. The Croydon Trades Council had sent a deputation to Mr. Page Hopps, asking him to help them keep "Citizen Sunday," by opening the church for a special service, to be attended by the working-class societies of the town. This was agreed to, and the various bodies organised a procession, with music and banners, and made a brave show, the day being beautifully fine. The church was insufficient for the throng of most interesting, sturdy-looking men in their "Sunday best"; but a band of willing helpers made the most of the church and its capacious vestibule, and all went off well. From the opening hymn to the closing benediction everything seemed to be touchingly and excitedly acceptable to the audience, and it must have occurred to many that we are within sight of an answer to the question: "Why do not the masses go to worship?" The subject of discourse was, "The Housing of the People." Mr. Page Hopps said he saw nothing for it but the intervention of the community, and the inclusion of house providing, with water providing, and tramway providing by public bodies, in order to emancipate the increasing population of strugglers from disgusting or deleterious conditions of daily life, from extortioners, and from the increasing crush. Public bodies could do the work on the necessary scale and as part of a compromise scheme: the ideal being to house large numbers of people some miles from the centres, and to provide frequent, quick, and cheap means of communication, all of which could be made to pay by public bodies, which could borrow money from the State at 3 per cent. and for long terms of years. The large audience, chiefly composed of picked workers who want better conditions of life, paid eager attention to the address, which had to be delivered amid little volleys of sympathetic cheers.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The first meeting of the session was held at Forest Gate on Saturday, Oct. 26, when a paper was given by Mr. Ames on "Topics for Teachers." This was followed by remarks by the Revs. W. G. Cadman, H. Woods Perris, and others. There were about thirty present.

Framlingham and Bedfield.—The anniversary services were held on Oct. 27, and were preceded by special mission services, conducted by the Rev. F. Summers, of London, in the villages round Bedfield. Much interest was aroused by these additional services. At Monk Soham the barn kitchen, which had been lent for the occasion, was crowded with forty-three people; and at Worlingworth, where the room was smaller, there were forty present. One invalid was carried in from a neighbouring cottage to take part in the service. The Rev. F. Summers was listened to with rapt attention. The order of service on each evening was as follows:—The hymns were given out by Mr. Cooke, of Bedfield, who frequently takes the Sunday service in the chapel when the Rev. A. Amey is at Framlingham; the lessons were read by the Rev. A. Amey; prayer was offered by Mr. Carlier, of London, and solos were sung by Miss E. Lawrence. The result of the mission services was shown by an increased interest on the Sunday. At Bedfield in the afternoon the chapel was well filled, and in the evening, when the Rev. A. Amey gave a lantern service, the building was so packed that it was calculated over 200 were present, and several people were turned away. At Framlingham at the same time the Rev. F. Summers gave an able exposition of Unitarianism and a special invitation to join the chapel to all those who were not connected with any place of worship. The congregation was the largest for many years, some fifty people being present. The annual tea and public meeting were held at Framlingham on Monday, Oct. 29, when Miss Tagart took the chair. Among those present were the Rev. L. Tavener, Mrs. Talbot, Miss Ridge, and Mrs. and the Misses Lawrenee. A varied programme of songs, recitations, addresses, and children's musical drill was much enjoyed by an audience of over 100. On Tuesday at Bedfield there was again a large gathering, including many lads and men. Addresses were given by the Rev. L. Tavener, the Rev. A. Amey, Mr. Dowsing, and Mr. Goldstein, and the programme was varied by songs and recitations. Miss Lawrence presided, and gave some account of her recent visit to Hungary. A Sale of Work, held both at Framlingham and Bedfield, realised £10 for the benefit of the chapels.

Huddersfield.—On Sunday week anniversary services were conducted in the Fitzwilliam-street Church by the Rev. Ramsden Balmforth, of Cape Town, a former minister. There was a large attendance at both services, in the evening the church being crowded. On the following Wednesday evening a congregational tea-meeting was held to celebrate the anniversary and welcome Mr. Balmforth. The Rev. W. Mellor presided, supported by the Revs. R. Balmforth, J. M. Whiteman, J. H. Green, Councillor Balmforth, and others. The Chairman spoke hopefully of the prospects of the church, and Mr. Balmforth gave a valuable address on the present painful situation in South Africa. There is a full report in the Huddersfield Daily Examiner of Oct. 24.

Ilkeston.—On Sunday week the Rev. Dr. Griffiths preached in the High-street Chapel a special sermon on "Our Duties as Citizens," to a good report of which the local Advertiser devoted more than half a column.

Ilminster.—At the Old Meeting a beautiful stained-glass window has been inserted to the memory of the late Mr. William Blake, of Bridge. It was made by the firm of John Hall and Sons, Bristol, and is admirable alike for the simplicity of its design and its rich colouring.

Loughborough.—The Rev. Peter Dean was welcomed as minister of Victoria-street Church on Wednesday evening, Oct. 23. Nearly a hundred sat down to tea in the schoolroom, after which the chair was taken by Mr. William Moss, J.P., ex-Mayor, and among those present were the Revs. H. Gow, W. Lindsay, W. G. Price, and Mr. Councillor Wilfrid Moss. Speeches were delivered by the ministers welcoming Mr. Dean on behalf of the congregations in the North Midland district, and Mr. Freeman and the Chairman welcomed him on behalf of the congregation. To these Mr. Dean replied. During a pleasant evening vocal contributions were given by Mrs. Wilfrid Moss, R.A.M., and Mr. Richardson.

Macclesfield (Appointment).—The Rev. W. G. Cadman, after nearly nine years' arduous work at the Mansford-street Church and Mission, has accepted the hearty and unanimous invitation of the congregation at Macclesfield to become their minister. He will enter upon his new duties at the end of March, 1902.

Mossley.—On Sunday the chapel anniversary services were conducted, morning and evening, by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., and in the afternoon by the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A. The collections amounted to £34 10s.

Northampton.—A bazaar was held in the Town Hall on Wednesday week by the Kettering-road congregation, to raise £200, the amount required in addition to about £360 already raised, to place a new organ in the church, and to clear off a debt of £35. Mr. Councillor J. Jackson presided, and Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, declared the bazaar open. Grateful reference was made to the late Sir Philip and Lady Manfield, to whom the congregation owed their new church.

Scarborough: Welcome Meeting.—On Wednesday, Oct. 23, a formal recognition and welcome was extended to the Rev. Ottwell Binns, as minister at Westborough Church. The proceedings commenced with a service at 5 P.M., when addresses were given by the Revs. Dendy Agate and Charles Hargrove, on "The Relation of the Congregation and the Minister," and "The Message of our Churches." After tea in the schoolroom, a public meeting was held, Mr. W. D. Cliff (Leeds) being in the chair. The secretary of the Scarborough congregation (Mr. Thomas Kettle) read letters of apology for absence from Lady O'Hagan, the Rev. F. Haydn Williams, and a number of local ministers and others, including the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, former minister of the church. The Rev. W. C. Wardle, Primitive Methodist, was at the service, but could not stay for the evening. The Chairman paid a tribute to Mr. Binns for having made the severance with the old faith when he could no longer honestly believe in it. Unitarianism produced a self-reliance which had been called coldness by others, but Mr. Binns would find a warmth of feeling and heart equal to any he had been used to. Mr. H. J. Morton, J.P., offered the welcome of the congregation, and spoke with hopeful confidence of their future. Mr. Thomas Kettle said their welcome was all the more genuine because Mr. Binns had been with them for nearly six months, during which time the congregation had gained in numbers and activity. Mr. Gilchrist also associated himself with the congregational welcome. As coming from another denomination himself, he had every sympathy with Mr. Binns in looking for light, and showing it to others. The Rev. Dendy Agate spoke as an old minister of the congregation. Mr. Binns's willingness to face the consequences of his conscientious change of opinion, and resultant loss of many friends, should secure for him new friends on whom to rely. He wished Mr. Binns and congregation God-speed through all the years. The welcome of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union was offered by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, who congratulated them on having the prettiest Unitarian Chapel in the North of England, in perhaps the finest town. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Secretary of the B. and F.U.A., and Mr. Ion Pritchard, of the S.S.A., and the Rev. C. Harvey Cook, of Leeds, also joined in the welcome. In returning thanks, Mr. Binns said that in spite of all he had heard about Unitarian coldness, he had never had such a warm welcome before. He then proceeded to give some interesting details of the way in which he came to be there. He was baptised in the Church of England, and attended a Church Sunday-school. He then went to a Wesleyan Sunday-school, afterwards acting as teacher, and then local preacher, with a view to the ministry. At this point the question of eternal punishment caused serious doubts in his mind, and he was glad when a doctor's certificate released him from continuing his studies for the Wesleyan Church. He was offered assistance to the Church of England, Baptist, or Congregational ministries, and chose the latter, as it seemed to offer most freedom, but he soon found that if he was to preach what he felt to be the truth, it would not be in the Congregational Church, and that was how he came where he was that night. After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the rest of the evening was spent in a social manner.

Southport.—On Sunday, Oct. 18, anniversary services were held in the Unitarian Church, Portland-street, the preacher being the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Birmingham. On the following evening the annual tea and congregational meeting were held in the schoolroom, marked like the Sunday services by a "record" attendance. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, and the speeches of the evening were interspersed with pleasant music. In the interval an organ recital had been given in the church by Mrs. Campbell, the organist of the congregation. The Chairman said a good many of their congregations seemed to have been celebrating their bi-centenary anniversaries of late. He wondered whether it was an advantage or a disadvantage to have a long history behind one. It gave any congregation a respectable standing to have been established and doing work for 200 years. Still there were dangers attending a too long history—the danger of living upon the past, as if a tradition of a hundred years and more was a sufficient justification for not doing very much in the present. The Southport congregation had no such danger. It had a very short history, thirty-nine years from the opening of the services in the Town Hall. "He liveth long who liveth well." That applied to churches as well as to individuals. Therefore they might spread out that thirty-nine years and say they had a very good history at the back of them. The test of a congregation living well was doing successfully or faithfully the particular work it had to do. Every church had its own special work, special mission, special problem, and special difficulties to solve. The work in Southport was very different from what it was, say, in Oldham. The problem was how to bring into their fold and fellowship those who were not satisfied with the teachings of the other churches—to provide a religious service that would appeal to the intellect and the inquiring mind—a service that would be in accord with the latest thought and knowledge of our day, and at the same time satisfy the religious sentiment and imagination of the young. If they sought only to provide a cold intellectual service they would inevitably lose the young people. Among the difficulties they had to face he reckoned the preaching of the "New Orthodoxy," and the character of a population newly settled, without associations with the church. But that would be overcome as the young people grew up, and they held loyalty to their church. A welcome was then offered to three visiting ministers by Mr. C. E. Hudson, seconded by Mr. Jagger, and helpful addresses were given by the Revs. E. W. Lummis, H. D. Roberts, and J. Morley Mills.

Sidmouth.—On Friday evening, Oct. 25, a lecture on "King Alfred the Great and Good," by the Rev. T. L. Marshall, was read to the members of the Literary and Scientific Society, Mr. D. B. Squire in the chair. The lecture was read in an admirably clear and interesting way by Miss M. E. Marshall, Mr. Marshall being under strict medical orders not to speak in public. There was a large attendance, and the lecture, which excited much interest, is reported at considerable length in two local papers.

Trebanos, S. Wales.—The half-yearly meetings were held on Sunday and Monday, when the Revs. W. Tudor Jones (Swansea), D. Rees (Pentre), and T. J. Jenkins (the minister), officiated. The chapel was crowded, and the collections towards the debt were very satisfactory. The Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul, had to cancel his engagement owing to indisposition.

Tavistock.—On Tuesday the fields forming the endowment of the old Dissenting meeting-house, Hatherleigh, were sold by auction for £217 10s., at the George Hotel, Hatherleigh, with the consent of the Charity Commissioners. The congregation at Hatherleigh lapsed at the close of the eighteenth century. The last minister was George Castle, the grandfather of Lady Bowring. For over a century the income has been paid to the Abbey Chapel, Tavistock. As a result of the publication of the notices, preliminary to the appointment of new trustees (members of the Abbey Chapel), and of the sale, objections were received by the Commissioners of Hatherleigh Parish Council and Hatherleigh Baptist and Bible Christian Ministers.

Whitchurch.—The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth was the preacher on Oct. 23, at the third of the special services, which are to be continued throughout the winter by the Rev. F. W. Turland.

wherein is set forth a

COMMON SENSE PHILOSOPHY FOR THE CONDUCT OF LIFE.

Specially written for unsophisticated and simple-minded Folk; and for those who ignore every form of conventional religion.

A theme for the Twentieth Century, and until the Millennium shall dawn.

BY BENJAMIN WALKER.

"There are many good things in this book. Throughout there runs a strong vein of theism, healthy and optimistic."—CHRISTIAN LIFE.

"We sympathise to a great extent with the author's dissatisfaction with formal philosophy and conventional religion, and agree that Stoicism properly understood offers a better refuge for the human mind. Mr. Walker's philosophy is not pure stoicism, as it is modified by Christian Theism, and the combination is productive of a cheerful optimism. The author says many sensible things. The book ought to be popular, and we wish it success."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York were welcomed home last week with great cordiality, reaching London on Saturday after their Colonial journey of nearly eight months. The chief object of the journey was that the Duke might open the first Parliament of the Australian Commonwealth, on behalf of the King, and in fulfilment of the wish of our late Queen. This duty was happily accomplished, after which New Zealand was visited, and then Natal and Cape Town, where the shadows of the South African tragedy cannot fail to have fallen on the Duke's generous heart. In Canada the Royal visitors traversed the whole continent to the Pacific coast, and in returning touched at Newfoundland, the oldest British colony. Everywhere they were met by expressions of the heartiest loyalty and of affection for the Mother Country.

RESOLUTIONS praying the Government to take immediate steps to mitigate the suffering and the terrible mortality in some of the South African Concentration Camps were passed last Sunday, among others by the congregations at Chester and Deal, and a memorial to the same effect, addressed to Lord Salisbury, was largely signed at Dunham-road Chapel, Altrincham. Miss E. L. Lister writes on the subject of the mortality in concentration camps :—Resolutions and petitions forwarded to the Prime Minister on this subject are little likely to affect the death-rate for a long time to come, if at all. What are probably most wanted are foods suitable for young children and invalids, soap, disinfectants, and clothing. The three first are sent out by the "Distress Fund," of which Lady Farrer, 3, Whitehall-court, S.W., is treasurer, and clothing by the "Boer Women and Children Clothing Fund," of which Miss E. D. Bradley, of 19, Linden-gardens, Bayswater, W., is hon. secretary.

THE Monthly Record of the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow, publishes an appeal for more support for the Scottish Unitarian Association, and also gives the programme of the University towns' lectures, to be delivered by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter during the present month. On Tuesday, Mr. Carpenter opened his course of four lectures on "The Gospels in the Nineteenth Century" at Aberdeen, on Wednesday at Edinburgh, and on Thursday at Glasgow. Last Sunday he preached at Dundee, and on the following three Sundays is to preach at Aberdeen, Edinburgh and Glasgow. At St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow, on Nov. 24, he will preach the annual sermons for the Scottish Unitarian Association, the annual meeting of the Association being held on the following day.

THE first of Mr. Stopford Brooke's University College lectures for the present season was given in the Botanical Theatre on Thursday week, the subject being the "Poetry of Matthew Arnold." Every seat was occupied, and if no one was turned away, some of the audience had to stand through the whole lecture, and counted it well worth while. Arnold was best, Mr. Brooke said, in Elegy, and nothing better of the kind had been written in England for two centuries than the "Scholar Gipsy" and "Thyrsis." He had the poetic nature and its artistic qualities, and if he had been born in a happier time might have done far greater work. He and Clough were the Hamlets among poets, but he had more moral power than Hamlet, because he clasped Stoicism to his breast, and that brought moral passion into his poetry and often gave it strength and dignity. Yet his work was spoilt by self-consciousness and isolation and a certain contempt for ordinary humanity. He was the poet of a class, not of the whole. Self-centred, he became too self-involved and the fires of poetry died out in him. Then he took to prose.

ON Tuesday evening the first of a series of lectures arranged by the Humanitarian League was given in the Council Room at Essex Hall, and, in spite of the inclement, foggy evening, there was an audience of about sixty. The course is on "Pioneers of Humanitarianism," the first lecture being on "Shelley," by Mr. Henry S. Salt. Dr. Furnivall, who was in the chair, in introducing the lecturer as a clear thinker and good critic, as well as an earnest reformer, recalled some interesting memories of Shelley and his wife, whom his father, as a young surgeon living at Egham, had known in the days when "Queen Mab" had just been published. The lecturer at the outset described two kinds of Shelley criticism, which formerly held the field—first the abusive, and, afterwards, the apologetic—the one describing him as an effectual demon, the other as an ineffectual angel. It was difficult, he thought, to say which was the more foolish, and proceeded to describe Shelley as a teacher with very definite ideals, based on the fundamental principle of the innate benevolence in human nature—a teacher still potent as the inspirer of many modern reformers. The second lecture, by Aylmer Maude, on "Tolstoy," is announced for Dec. 3; the third, by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, on "Ruskin," for Jan. 14. The lectures are at eight o'clock.

ON Thursday, Oct. 31, there died at Richmond, Surrey, Mrs. Elizabeth Hanbury, at the age of 108. Mrs. Hanbury was the youngest child of John Sanderson, a member of the Society of Friends, and was born in the city of London, June 9, 1793. In November, 1826, she married Cornelius Hanbury, and her eldest son, Cornelius, born in the following year, is now head of the firm of Allen and Hanbury. She was a devoted member of the Society of Friends, being a recognised minister. She shared in the work of Elizabeth Fry among the prisoners of Newgate, and in the anti-slavery work of the Gurneys and Clarkson. From early life she was by preference a total abstainer, and enjoyed remarkably good health, being able to read and write at a hundred. Only after she was 106 did she find the exertion of getting up and dressing each day too much for her. Her only daughter, Charlotte, died a little more than a year ago. There is nothing mythical about Mrs. Hanbury. Her great age is clearly authenticated.

THE Christian Freeman contains this month two articles of special interest, an account of the opening of the new College buildings at Kolozsvar on Sept. 22, by Miss Fangh, who was there, and took part in the proceedings, making a short speech on behalf of the Committee of Hungarian ladies, when an embroidered silk banner was presented to the College; and a vivid account of a visit to Toroczko, by Miss Lawrence, who was one of Miss Tagart's English party on the recent visit to Hungary.

FREEDOM AND THE HUMAN SELF.

SIR,—The long breaks in the correspondence on this subject make a summary of the discussion at once desirable and difficult. It grew out of an interchange of views between Dr. Mellone and Professor Upton on the relation of "absolute idealism" to free-will and moral responsibility. Mr. Upton maintained that the moral responsibility of which we are conscious as a fact—and not simply as a desideratum as Mr. Lummis appears to have understood him—requires a possibility of alternative action for which there is no room in the theory of absolute idealism.

Mr. Mott intervened by challenging the generally accepted idea of moral responsibility. And at this point, writing from the same philosophical standpoint as Mr. Upton, I brought forward a question, which arises after it is admitted that we ourselves determine by our own choice among the motives that impel or solicit us, and that our action is not necessarily determined by the strongest motive. That position which I defended, and which is also supported by Mr. Solly and Miss Manning, appears to me impregnable, and affords large scope for free-will and moral responsibility. But the question remains, Why, after all, did we ourselves choose or act as we did?

That question has elicited three valuable and interesting answers. Mr. Solly and Mr. Lummis, in different ways, say that the question goes beyond the scope of our intelligence; that we have reached an ultimate fact, or one to which the law of causality itself may not apply. And certainly the question is superfluous, as Mr. Solly urges, in dealing with the practical moral and religious life. But it has its importance in connection with universal salvation and complete divine fore-knowledge, both of which would be subject to doubt if there is an absolutely incalculable element in human choice.

That doubt appears to be involved in Professor Upton's reply to my letter, in which he accepts the alternative that our choice in the last resort may be called "chance." Neither does it appear to me to have any bearing upon our moral responsibility that we might have happened to act differently. And further, I cannot apply that idea of freedom to God—namely, that His choice of the good may be called chance; that He might have happened to choose the evil, and if He retains that freedom, might possibly happen to do so now.

The All-good surely can only do good; not from lack of power to do evil if He chose, but because He chooses not to. The good is His own preference and choice because He loves the good and hates the evil.

So in thinking of human freedom my mind gravitates to the alternative, that in the last resort our choice depends upon the ultimate make of our being, along with the operation of the Holy Spirit remoulding our being from within. That allows of the retort, that we could not then have chosen differently unless we ourselves had been different, and in that sense are not responsible for the choice we made. But we are responsible so far that it was our own choice, and shows what we are, and that we are not passively controlled by impelling forces, and can, if we choose, determine differently in future, by exerting our power of will, or opening our being to the inflowing of divine grace.

To that position—which in great measure reconciles human freedom and divine fore-knowledge, those twin foci of the curve of thought on this question—my mind gravitates. But at the same time I only hold it tentatively, as the best I can think, while recognising that the ultimate truth may be an inscrutable mystery beyond the reach of human thought. As Langland says in "Piers Ploughman":—

> This I trow to be truth. Whoso can teach thee better, > Look thou suffer him to say, and then teach it further.

C. D. BADLAND.

THE LONDON & SOUTH-EASTERN PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

SIR,—At the time when Dr. Martineau's scheme for organisation was being discussed, some of the older members of our denomination shook their heads, and were of opinion that the inevitable result of "organisation" would be a loss of that perfect freedom which each congregation had theretofore enjoyed, and that occasions would arise when a majority vote would squash a strong opposition and thus create the elements for cleavage in our ranks.

How true these prophets were may be seen from the brief history of the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly. Soon after its inception, in the face of strong and influential opposition, so numerically large that prudent managers would have hesitated before giving practical expression to a resolution passed by so comparatively small a majority, it was resolved to form an "Advisory Committee."

Shortly afterwards a weak chairman permitted a resolution not on the agenda paper to be put and passed, but with violent and noisy opposition, showing that the matter in question was utterly unsuited to the time and place; and an academic recommendation to the Government was stultified by the declaration of war against us by a State with whom we had no quarrel almost before this resolution could be put into print.

The result of another "organisation" posing as Unitarian, and convened for a strictly party political purpose, has also been most disastrous, so far as our experience at Wandsworth is concerned. We have through it—aided by THE INQUIRER's articles—lost valued friends and supporters who have seceded from our ranks, together with income that we can ill afford to lose.

The most recent move of the "London and South-Eastern Provincial" in carrying a resolution and putting it into operation, by 44 votes against an opposition of 33, on a delicate subject of the utmost importance, that had not even previously been submitted to the various churches for the purpose of allowing them to instruct their delegates, will surely give pause to those churches represented by the 33 minority delegates, as to whether the time has not come to reconsider their position as members of this organisation.

In our own church, at least, we have men and women of almost every shade of political opinion, who meet there on common ground; and the committal of our congregation, as a unit of a larger organisation, to the discussion of "public," which will inevitably drift into party political, questions, is a danger that I am of opinion every one of our churches should hesitate to face.

We are numerically—even the whole of our churches put together—such a drop in the ocean compared to the total of the so-called orthodox churches, that one would think our would-be leaders might be content with the pressing forward those fundamental truths that we hold in common, and leave it to outside politicians to deal with those doubtlessly interesting, but bifurcating subjects, that can only prove disastrous to so small a community as ours, by inevitably causing serious dissensions, when opposition is in the proportion of three to four.

LITERATURE.

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.*

ONE of the great achievements of the nineteenth century in the world of letters was completed by the publication at midsummer, 1900, of the sixty-third and final volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography," a work projected by the late George Smith, head of the firm of Smith, Elder and Co., in 1882, and from the beginning of 1885 issued in quarterly volumes, with unfailing regularity, under the editorship, first of Mr. Leslie Stephen, and from 1890, of Mr. Sidney Lee. Before so great an undertaking could be completed, it was inevitable that many distinguished men and women, who would naturally find a place in such a dictionary, should have passed away; and, indeed, 56 of the 653 contributors to the Dictionary had themselves died. It was, therefore, arranged that three supplemental volumes should be published, to make good a certain number of omissions which had been noted in the original work, but particularly to complete the record up to the close of the century. Then, in the early days of the new century, Queen Victoria died, and it was felt that she, of whose reign the Dictionary was so largely a monument, must be included, so that the date of her death became the limit, and in the third and final volume of the Supplement, now published, of the 522 pages rather more than a fifth is devoted to her life, written by the editor. One other addition was made to the Supplement as originally planned, for before it could be issued Mr. George Smith himself, to whose enthusiasm and generosity we owe this great work, had also passed away, and a biographical sketch of the distinguished publisher, with a reproduction of Watts's portrait, was fitly prefixed to the first volume.

The present notice is concerned specially with the third and concluding volume of the Supplement; but our readers will be interested to know that to the first volume Mr. Alexander Gordon contributes the article on Charles Beard, while in the same volume will be found notices by various writers of G. J. Allman, George Busk, and Herbert Carpenter, and in the second volume of G. A. Fripp and Thomas Hincks.

Mr. Gordon has been one of the chief contributors to the Dictionary. His articles in the original work numbered altogether 691, making in amount as much as a volume and three-quarters. His subjects included Unitarians, ranging in time from Paul Cardale to John Hamilton Thom, while among the chief of his articles were Calamy, Doddridge, George Fox, Jeremy Taylor, the Wesleys and Whitefield. In the last volume of the Supplement his principal article is on James Martineau, but he has written also on Robert Knox, Archbishop of Armagh, F. W. Newman, and Robert Spears.

The article on Martineau is a full and concise account of our great teacher, filling nine and a half columns, with a brief notice of Russell Martineau added.

In speaking of the development of Martineau's philosophic thought, Mr. Gordon seems to us to have misread a passage in the preface to the "Types of Ethical Theory," for unless we are mistaken Martineau does not say there that the "new intellectual birth" which he experienced during his winter's study at Berlin under Trendelenburg, involved the complete "surrender of determinism." The doctrine of determinism he had already completely abandoned at the demand of his own moral nature before he went to Berlin, and there by the revelation brought by his new insight into Greek philosophy he came, as he says, "into the same plight, in respect of the cognitive and æsthetic side of life, that had already befallen me in regard to the moral." And when of Martineau's presentment of free-will Mr. Gordon says that because all the lines of action, between which choice lies, lead to the same goal, "the result seems indistinguishable from fatalism," that seems to us hardly to do justice to the doctrine; for while we may be confident that the Eternal Goodness must finally prevail to bring every living soul into accord with the perfect life, there may yet be ample scope for a genuine process of moral discipline, with a free choice between good and evil, which we cannot associate with any form of fatalism. On another side of Martineau's work we regret that Mr. Gordon should have introduced criticism by means of anonymous quotations, as where he refers to the "Seat of Authority," and in regard to Martineau's New Testament criticism adds, "it has been remarked as 'strange, that whenever our Lord's language is at issue with Dr. Martineau's philosophy, the evangelists have been bad reporters.'" Martineau's historical criticism (not his philosophy) may have been sometimes at fault, but the "Seat of Authority" deserved, in our view, some more discerning criticism as well as more generous appreciation than the above quotation indicates. These, however, are the only points at which we have felt at all inclined to demur in our reading of this article, which is a masterly piece of condensation. Of Martineau's personality Mr. Gordon writes:—

> His strenuous character and æsthetic sense marked every detail of his work; he was an excellent man of business, and his most ordinary correspondence had distinction and a high finish. Old age gave grandeur to his countenance, and a refined gentleness to his demeanour. In his conversation as in his letters there was a rare combination of dignified modesty and courtly grace.

The ultimate value of his contributions to philosophy Mr. Gordon does not attempt to determine, but adds: "As an intellectual and moral force, he impressed himself on his generation both by his writings and by his personality."

The article on Francis Newman occupies five columns, a column and a-half going to a list of the professor's very various publications; but it is not noted that Newman regarded his "Hebrew Theism" (1874), as a second and revised edition of "Theism, Doctrinal and Practical" (1858); and there was another curious little book of his, "Secret Hymns" (Nottingham, 1892), in which Newman edited and partly re-wrote fifty-three of his favourite hymns, adapting them to his own religious views.

Mr. Gordon's article on Robert Spears, occupying nearly two columns, is a tribute of warm friendship, which will be appreciated by many of our readers. Spears is well described as a Unitarian preacher and journalist, and while his own theology was "biblical" his deep interest in the Brahmo Somaj of India is noted. On his initiative, Mr. Gordon says, the "Christian Conference" was founded in 1881, bringing together representatives of all denominations, from Cardinal Manning to Dr. Martineau.

Personally he was a man of singularly winning characteristics; his massive head was full of strong good sense and marvellous knowledge of men and things; his robust energy was equalled only by his generous warmth of heart.

Speaking of Spears's propagandist work, and of churches he founded, Mr. Gordon having spoken of Highgate, names "other new causes due directly to his suggestion." Are we to take this as a final surrender to that dreadful form of denominational slang? We confess it sets our teeth on edge.

In this final volume of the Supplement there are a number of other articles of great interest. The most elaborate after that on Queen Victoria is John Ruskin, by Mr. E. T. Cook. Huxley, Jowett, Millais, William Morris, Max Müller, Mundella, Sidgwick, Stansfeld, Anna Swanwick, and Henry Tate, we have also noted with special interest. The article on Mary Kingsley is contributed by Miss Toulmin Smith. That on Richard Holt Hutton, which fills nearly six columns, is based on a sketch by Mr. D. C. Lathbury, who evidently does not know THE INQUIRER, which Hutton with J. L. Sanford edited for a short time early in the fifties, for he describes it as a "Unitarian Magazine." Of the National Review Martineau should have been also named as joint editor with Hutton and Bagehot. It is rightly stated that Hutton entered Manchester College in 1847, and studied there "under James Martineau and John James Tayler"; but he only remained for one session, and in the winter of 1848 he was reading Plato with Martineau at Berlin.

In welcoming this final volume of the Supplement we are glad to learn that a full Index of the Dictionary, including the Supplement, is in preparation. It will serve not only as a practical aid of great value for reference, but as one more demonstration of the splendid comprehensiveness of a noble and truly national work.

BRITISH "GOTHENBURG" EXPERIMENTS.*

THIS is a valuable and timely little book. From various causes, of which a principal one is Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell's earlier volume, interest in the Temperance question has much deepened of late; and amongst the signs of an earnest desire to grapple with it are the experiments described and examined in this new work. All the experiments are examples of the substitution of public for private control of the liquor traffic, and it is important that we should have a fair and searching estimate of them as contributions to the solution of the great problem. This we now have.

So many attempts at reform by legislation have been defeated either by "the trade," or by those who would suppress the trade by means of confiscation, or by a strange undesigned union of these mutually abhorrent forces, that many persons have asked—"Can we not do something more than we are doing even during 'the law's delay'?" There have been other causes impelling in the same direction, such as a deeper consideration of the problem, a clearer view of its many-sidedness, the growth of a conviction that temperance is best promoted by influencing human nature as a whole, a new sense of the value of positive methods and of the futility of preaching a mere "do not." Considerations of these kinds induced me some years ago to join the Bishop of Chester's Society for the promotion of Public House Reform. It has, therefore, been a matter of no small interest to me, as it will be to others, to read what Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell have to say about the operations of this and kindred bodies (including municipalities as licensees). A brief indication of their principal conclusions is all that can be attempted here.

As a whole, the efforts now being made to substitute public for private control have their hearty sympathy—they value them as experiments and as illustrations of a good principle. But they strongly insist that without further legislation such efforts must be confined within very narrow limits, and will do very little to reduce the evils which exist. In the present state of things it is possible and expedient to secure for public bodies licences which would otherwise be granted to private traders; but it is difficult and dangerous to buy licences already granted. A case will illustrate both points. Earl Grey, desiring to anticipate the private trader, applied for a licence for Broomhill, in Northumberland, and obtained it. "I immediately discovered," he says, "that the State, in conferring upon me a monopoly licence, had also granted me a commercial asset of enormous value. I was informed that if I would consent to sell my licence, I could, without spending a single sixpence, obtain nearly £10,000" (p. 93). The only reasonable opinion upon so extraordinary a fact is that which Earl Grey goes on to express and which he has put into effect. "Now, it appears to me that large monopoly value arising out of the possession of a public licence conferred upon a private individual by the State ought to belong, not to any private individual, but to the community" (p. 94). True. But if a brewer or publican had prevailed upon the magistrates to grant the licence to him, would Earl Grey or any society or company have offered £10,000 for it so promptly? Plainly the reduction of private licences by purchase is a very serious financial undertaking.

Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell also urge that if the pecuniary interests of Temperance Reformers became to any considerable extent bound up with the trade, their zeal for reform would be likely to slacken. Even in the case of new licences there is the difficulty that the reformed houses must be made attractive in order to compete with the others; and reformed attractions are not attractive to the unreformed man. Valuable, then, as these experiments are, they only enforce the lesson that the existing monopoly should be made public instead of private, and that for this purpose new legislation is urgently required.

Some of the experiments come under criticism for not more strictly devoting surplus profits to counter-attractions to the public-house, and on this and other points of detail the reader will find interesting applications of the principle laid down by the authors in their larger work.

Two chapters may be specially commended to the notice of the Town Councillors and others who are responsible for local government. They describe the working of public-houses established by the Corporations of Birmingham and Harrogate for their employés engaged in the construction of waterworks.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Unambitious Queen, a Mediæval Dynastic Absurdity, adapted and dramatised by Henry W. Hawkes, is a children's play strongly to be recommended to those on the look-out for a thoroughly wholesome and amusing piece of acting for their young people. The play is founded on a story in the Christian Register of March 16, 1893, and is written for the most part in easy verse; it is a harmless satire on the great ones of the world and their courtiers, and gives scope for a good deal of capital fun in the acting. (B. C. Hare, 4, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 3d. net.)

WE have received the first three parts of the new Twentieth Century Citizens' Atlas of the World, edited by J. G. Bartholomew, F.R.G.S. The atlas is to be issued in twenty-six fortnightly parts, and promises to be a very beautiful and valuable work. There will be 156 pages of maps, some of them on single pages, but mostly on the double open page. Of the maps we have seen the most striking is that of central Europe and the Mediterranean, in which the great masses of the mountain country and the plains are brought out with great skill; all are very clearly printed. (George Newnes, Ltd. 6d. each part, net.)

The Atonement and Intercession of Christ, by D. C. Davies, M.A.—The author of this book, the late Principal of Trevecca College, was evidently a man of considerable learning who was held in great respect by all denominations in Wales. He represents the old school of orthodox theology which is founded upon the literal interpretation of the Bible as an infallible book, and distrusts the "higher criticism." Accepting Principal Davies' primary assumption, it is easy to make out a strong case, especially from the Pauline Epistles for at least semi-orthodoxy on such doctrines as the Atonement, Propitiation, Mediatorship and Intercession. The whole controversy is very arid, and the recent symposium in the Christian World shows how the highest authorities differ widely from the old traditional orthodoxy as well as from one another. It would be interesting to know where Principal Davies finds that "Unitarians deny that Christ died for all." As the hero or the martyr dies for his country or his Church, so it may truly be said that Christ lived and died not for one nation or Church, but for the whole world, but not "vicariously" for any one. Here we make the fundamental distinction which goes to the root both of ethics and theology, and no amount of textual argument founded upon the old Hebrew usages and sacrifices can really affect the faith of the Liberal Christian. The book is noteworthy as an indication that the old orthodoxy lingers chiefly among the perfervid preachers of Wales. (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 4s.)

Madame Marie, Singer, by Ester Dale.—There is reason to believe that some readers of THE INQUIRER occasionally indulge in a novel! We have, therefore, much pleasure in introducing "Madame Marie, Singer," written by one of themselves, who was born and bred in the communion of our churches. The writer has chosen to conceal her identity under a nom de plume which we shall not betray; but the circumstance just mentioned will add special interest to the book for many readers. Not indeed that it requires any extraneous recommendations, since it is admirably qualified to win its way on its own merits. The heroine is blessed (or, as she must sometimes have felt, cursed!) with the divine gift of song, and it is her unhappy fate to be brought up amid utterly ungenial surroundings. The struggle that takes place between the inner necessities of her nature and the feeling of duty to others is described with a fidelity and tenderness that in some ways remind one of Maggie Tulliver's story. A lighter element is supplied in the delightfully amusing descriptions of life and character in the small provincial Slowton. These descriptions are marked by the kind of playful satire, of which Mrs. Gaskell's "Cranford" is the classic example. The book is thoroughly wholesome, without being in the least "preachy," and the writer, who is quite familiar with her ground, both in Slowton and on the Continent, has, in what we believe to be her first work, achieved a success in both matter and style, which is full of highest promise for the future. (London: The Leadenhall Press, Limited. 3s. 6d.)

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE article in this month's Reviews which will probably attract the most attention is that by the new President of the United States, which holds the place of honour in the Fortnightly; and we may be thankful that the eminence of the writer should bring prominently before the public such a subject as "Reform through Social Work," and in an article so thoroughly practical and sound in principle. The article was, no doubt, written before the tragedy which called President Roosevelt to take the chief place among his people, but it is matter for the sincerest congratulation that it is such a man, and not another, who has been so called. The sub-title of the article is "Some Forces that tell for Decency in New York City," and writing from close personal knowledge—for he himself has been in the fray—the President tells of the work that has been done by men in various positions to resist the corruptions of Tammany, and to mitigate the social evils which spring up in the worst quarters of New York, as in every other great city. The general conclusion, from a variety of instances, is that any man with practical sense and genuine humanity, who will go and live among the people, without patronage, and with a true desire to help as a friend, will find means of doing immeasurable good.

"Tammany" is dealt with also in the Monthly Review, in an article by Mr. Sydney Brooks, its long history dating back to May, 1789. Tammany seems to have been an Indian chief of ideal character—a fitting patron saint for the revolutionary lodges of those days. "Tammany" began as a political club. Its subsequent development, and the rise of the "Boss," Mr. Brooks describes for our enlightenment and warning. Readers of Bolton King and Thomas Okey's "Italy To-day" should read the article on "Wealth, Poverty, and Socialism in Italy," by L. Villari, with its criticism of the Socialists and its hope for democratic Italy. The illustrated article in the Monthly was for some time devoted to Italian Art. This month it has turned to race-horses.

The Contemporary opens with an article on "The New President of the United States," by Mr. Albert Shaw, who clearly writes with intimate knowledge, and furnishes a valuable supplement to Mr. Bigelow's article last month in the same Review. Of Mr. Roosevelt's high character and devotion to the public good Mr. Shaw gives many instances, and concludes as follows:—

Among the many books of which Mr. Roosevelt is the author, are two collections of essays, one entitled "American Ideals," the other "The Strenuous Life." The papers included in these collections deal with many phases of American social, political, economic and ethical problems. Their tone is one of earnest yet optimistic appeal for the highest and best things in politics and society. Mr. Roosevelt's life as a public man has been the faithful reflex of the doctrines and opinions he has presented in the essays comprised in these two books—he has practised what he has preached. He will continue to work constantly for purer and better domestic government, and for the increase of American repute among the nations. He is a strong advocate of the Monroe doctrine, but his defence of it involves no feeling of hostility towards European Powers on the one hand, and no desire on the other hand to aggrandise the United States at the expense of the other American Republics. His international attitude, in short, will be as pacific as that of Mr. McKinley, whose policies will be continue without perceptible change of direction.

Mr. J. F. Hogan, M.P., writes on "First Steps of the New Commonwealth," describing the first government of United Australia, and touching on the problems, national and international, which will have to be faced. Mr. Richard Heath's article on "Protestantism in France," drawing out the striking contrast between the diminishing numbers of the Protestant Churches and the steady growth of Protestant influence in society and the state, contains a high tribute to the late Felix Pécaut, formerly a Protestant pastor and an educational reformer of great eminence. Pécaut was appointed Inspector-General of Public Instruction, but it was in the Normal High School for Girls at Fontenoy, of which he was appointed by M. Jules Ferry director, that the best example of his influence was seen, embodying "the spirit of Protestantism in its purest form." "Pécaut," said the late Dean Sabatier, in reply to a critic, "did introduce into Fontenoy something of the Jansenist spirit—independence in matters of conscience, inward religion, sweet and serious morality, enlightened and solid reason." And Mr. Heath adds:—

But to this spirit he added a new element, and one which transfigured all the others, a spirit of philosophic and religious tolerance. Nevertheless, he went to the root of all moral life, to that point where all noble souls agree, be their creed and ritual what they may. His first principle—"intellectual sincerity leads to inward sincerity"—he carried out so thoroughly in all he was, and did, and said, that he acquired a kind of religious ascendency over those who came under his influence. Lay education, he asserted, only put positive religion in peril when that religion, instead of being truly religious, was petrified in ecclesiastical formulas, rites, practices, and supernatural history. He hoped that France, under the auspices of Free Thought, would find again the sense and savour of the ancient Christian doctrine forgotten so long, and to-day more than ever forgotten. In an article on his life and work, M. Sabatier said: "Born at Salies, in Béarn, in 1828, of an old Huguenot family, Felix Pécaut had in his origin inherited a morally heroic temperament and a fervour intensely religious." "In educational matters his name is more than that of a master, it has become a programme and an ideal."

Mr. Heath, who contributed an article to the Contemporary recently, on "The Waning of Evangelicalism," gives an interesting account of the fortunes of Protestantism in France during the past century. He believes that only a revival of what he regards as genuine evangelical doctrine will avail to save the Protestant Church from extinction, and sees signs of hope because the Evangelical Protestants are beginning to realise the necessity for a social Christianity.

To the Nineteenth Century and After Mrs. Creighton contributes a useful article on "The Employment of Educated Women," describing the aims of the Central Employment Bureau (9, Southampton-street, Holborn, W.C.); and Mr. Wilfranc Hubbard gives a most timely account of the "French Associations Law," showing its scope, and how it effects the Religious Orders as opposed to the regular clergy of the Catholic Church. The Pope has refused to sanction submission to the law on the part of the Orders, and on this Mr. Hubbard remarks:—

In plain words, the enemy, to whom the Holy See will not allow them to surrender and they themselves are so unwilling to submit, is not the French Government, but the French Church. It is not the inquisition of the civil authorities which they dread, but the supervision of ecclesiastical authority in France; and they are fleeing, not from the tyranny of the Government, but from future subordination to the bishops.

In the Westminster the Rev. Walter Lloyd has an article on "What is Christianity?" in review of Harnack's well-known lectures, with which he is not altogether satisfied, and arguing that Jesus himself, in Galilee, was influenced by Greek culture, thus accounting for the affinity which Christianity afterwards showed for Hellenism. Mr. Lloyd says at the conclusion of his article, referring to the declaration that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath, that "This superb indifference to Judaism, springing up in its very midst, could only have been due to some influence from outside, and all the conditions lead to the conclusion that the influence must have come from Greece!" If nothing can be allowed in the realm of spiritual religion to the power of original creative genius, or the direct inspiration of a supreme religious teacher, we might be ready to admit Mr. Lloyd's plea; otherwise we do not feel the force of his argument from "all the conditions."

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE TO THE COUNCIL, PRESENTED ON WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 30.

SINCE the date of the annual meeting of the Association, the Executive Committee have held three meetings, and there have been fourteen meetings of Sub-Committees. The Committee at their first meeting appointed various Sub-Committees for dealing with the work of the Association, and each of these has elected its Chairman for the year as follows:—Finance: Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke; Scottish: Mr. Percy Preston; Mission: Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.; Publications: Mr. George H. Leigh; Indian: Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A.,; Civil Rights: Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee; General Purposes: Rev. James Harwood, B.A.

Finance.—For the nine months of the current year, ending Sept. 30, the Treasurer has received £1,385 in subscriptions, £121 in donations, £136 in collections, £746 in dividends, and £911 for sale of publications. The expenditure during the same period includes £1,706 in grants, £502 for printing, binding and purchasing books and pamphlets, £193 for maintenance and other expenses, and £533 in salaries of office and book-room staff. The balance in hand is more than pledged for the remainder of the year—indeed, unless increased resources are forthcoming it will be necessary to intrench on the invested stock belonging to the Association.

Publications.—Since the last meeting of the Council the following books and pamphlets have been published:—"Liberal Religious Thought at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century," the papers and addresses at the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, edited by the Secretary; "The Christology of the New Testament," five expository discourses by the Rev. R. B. Drummond; "A Confession of Heresy and a Plea for Frankness," by Mr. T. J. Hardy, B.A., formerly a Church of England clergyman; the two volumes of "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," by the Rev. J. Hamilton Thom, published at a cheap price through the generosity of Mr. William Rathbone. The Committee have also published six lectures by the Rev. R. Travers Herford, on "Unitarian Affirmations"; two of the lectures contained in this book have been issued as separate pamphlets—namely, "Jesus Christ" and "The Future Life." Arrangements are in progress for publishing the "Year Book for 1902," and the "Pocket Almanack" is already in type. The Rev. A. M. Jensen, a recent convert to Unitarianism in Denmark, has translated the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Back to Jesus" into the Danish language; Bishop Ferencz, assisted by several others at Kolozsvar, is at work translating the volume of addresses and papers at the International Council into Hungarian. The following pamphlets and leaflets have been reprinted:—Unitarian leaflets.—"The Atonement," by the Rev. F. Walters; "Search the Scriptures," by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie; "The God, or Human Christ," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong; "The Religion the Age Wants," by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. Tracts for the Times.—"Principles and Ideals of Unitarians," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong; "Our Unitarian Gospel," by the Rev. M. J. Savage; also two of the papers in the International Volume—the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Religious Thought in England at the close of the Nineteenth Century," and the sermon, "the Kingdom of God Within," by the Rev. Stopford A.

Brooke. The Ulster Unitarian Christian Association have had 500 copies of this sermon for circulation in Ireland. The following pamphlets have been translated into Russian and published by Mr. V. Tchertkoff, of Christchurch, Hants; "Brief Account of Unitarianism," by Dr. Brooke Herford; "Unitarianism Explained," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong; "Unitarian Christianity," by Dr. Channing; and the "Transient and Permanent in Christianity," by Theodore Parker.

At the last meeting of the Council it was reported that the Committee were at work preparing a new edition of the Essex Hall Hymnal. The Sub-Committee charged with the preparation of the new Hymnal have made good progress with their work, and the book is expected to be ready early in the New Year. The compilers, however, have been anxious rather to secure as far as possible a really satisfactory result, than to finish speedily a task involving extensive search for available material, and careful consideration of its suitability for congregational use. They have been greatly helped by the assistance of ministers and other experienced friends in different parts of the country; and it is hoped that through their valuable co-operation the new collection, which will be of an inclusive character, and not confined to any one type of thought amongst us, will meet with wide acceptance.

From Jan. 1 to Sept. 30, 1901, 1,098 books, 80,461 pamphlets, valued at £227, have been granted for the use of churches, postal missions, ministers and private inquirers. The letters that are received almost daily at Essex Hall show that there are large numbers of people in all parts of the world who are most grateful for the guidance and help afforded by the books and pamphlets which are issued by the Association.

Mission Work.—The following grants have been voted since the last meeting of the Council:—Carlisle, £5, Special Services; Colwyn Bay, £10, Special Summer Services; Colyton, £10; Eastern Union Postal Mission, £2; Gateshead, £45; High Peak Chapels (Bradwell, Flagg, and Great Hucklow), £10; Ipswich, £5, Special Lectures; King's Lynn, £10, for supplies; Postal Mission (Moorfields), £5; Newton Abbot, £10 for supplies, and £10 for furnishing new chapel; Plymouth, £15; North Midland Missionary, £100; Pudsey, £25, for new class rooms; Reading, £25, for new school buildings. The question of appointing a missionary and reopening the chapel at Bridgend is occupying the attention of the Committee, in co-operation with the South East Wales Unitarian Society. The annual grants to congregations for 1902 will be considered shortly. The Secretary and various members of the Committee have visited several of the grant-aided churches during recent months.

McQuaker Trust.—After many disappointments the congregation at Aberdeen have now secured a site in a most central part of the city, and it is hoped that the work of building the new church will soon be commenced in earnest. Lectures on week-nights, expository of Unitarianism, have been given during October by the Rev. Alex. Webster at Culter, Inverurie, and Woodside, and an average of sixty people have attended each evening.

The Chairman of the Scottish Committee, Mr. Percy Preston, accompanied by the Secretary, visited in the early part of September the grant-aided churches at Aberdeen, Kirkcaldy, Glasgow (South St. Mungo-street), and Kilmarnock, and also held a conference with the Committee of the Scottish Association at Glasgow. The Chairman presented a full report to the Committee, giving an account of the visits, and it was agreed that, if possible, either the Chairman or some other member of the Committee should each year visit the grant-aided churches, as it was important for the Committee to be kept in close touch with all that was going on in Scotland. The Kilmarnock Church property has been conveyed to the Scottish Unitarian Association, and it is hoped that if a suitable minister could be secured, the Unitarian cause might be resuscitated. At Kirkcaldy the small but earnest congregation have kept well together, in spite of their being without a minister for six months.

The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Oxford, will begin a course of four lectures on the "Gospels in the Nineteenth Century" in the University towns of Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow next week. He will also preach on the Sundays in November at Dundee, Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow. The Committee are greatly indebted to Mr. Carpenter for so readily undertaking this important educational work in Scotland.

Foreign Mission Work.—At Auckland, New Zealand, the Rev. William Jellie, B.A., is making good headway, the little church there is progressing, and there is every prospect that in a reasonable time it will become self-supporting, though the Committee of the Association are at present making a large grant. The foundation-stones of the new church building were laid last August. The Committee have made a grant of £50 towards the £1,000 required, and they have authorised the Secretary to make an appeal on behalf of Auckland. Up to the present time the sum of £175 has been subscribed, and the Committee would earnestly urge that others should render assistance, so that a handsome donation may be forwarded from the Mother-country.* The Council will remember that reports have been submitted respecting the Unitarian movement at Copenhagen, Denmark. In the summer of this year, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong visited Copenhagen, addressed the members of the church, and in view of his report, the Committee have made a further grant of £10 in aid of the publication of the little paper published by the Rev. U. Birkedal and Mr. Theo. Berg. Mr. Armstrong is strongly of opinion that Scandinavia offers a great opportunity for the propagation of Unitarian Christianity.

The Committee believe that one of the best ways of helping liberal religious thought in foreign lands is to offer scholarships to suitable students, prepared to come to England and study at Manchester College, Oxford. The students return to their native lands and devote themselves to the spread of liberal religion among their own people. The Council will be gratified to learn that the first Japanese student—Mr. Zennosuke Toyosaki—has arrived, and is now at Oxford. Next year there will be an Icelandic student, towards the cost of whose college course a grant of money has already been promised by the Committee.

Work in India.—The latest Indian student, Mr. Vithal Ranji Shinde, B.A., of Poona, is prosecuting his studies at Manchester College, Oxford. He was highly recommended by the Committee charged with the selection of a student, and it is hoped that he will profit greatly from his stay in England. From Jan. to Sept. 30, 536 books and 3,053 pamphlets, to the value of £69, have been sent to applicants in different parts of India. At the Khasi Hills the Mission work, under the general superintendence of Mr. H. Kissor Singh, is progressing. There are a number of small stations with mission workers to each. The Committee have been urged again and again to send out an English Missionary to organise and superintend the work in Assam, but they are unable for several reasons to accede to this request. The great services rendered to the Association by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, while in India, will be dealt with specially later in the afternoon.

Deputations.—At the annual meetings of the following societies, the Association was represented:—South-East Wales Society, at Swansea, by the Secretary; Western Union, at Bridgwater, by the Secretary; Eastern Union, at Ipswich, by Miss Lawrence; the Southern Association, at Newport, Isle of Wight, by the Rev. F. W. Stanley; London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly, at London, by the Secretary; the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, by the President. The President also attended the opening of the New Church at Moss Side, Manchester, the opening of the bazaar at Northampton, and several other special meetings up and down the country. The Rev. V. D. Davis attended the pilgrimage to Catterick; the Rev. James Harwood visited Carlisle and other places, and will shortly visit Ireland; Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee attended the Welcome Meeting to Mr. Higham, at Wolverhampton; the Secretary the Welcome Meeting to Mr. Rossington at Longsight, Manchester, and that to Mr. Binns at Scarborough.

Autumnal Meetings.—The reports in THE INQUIRER and the Christian Life last week will have informed members of the Council of the interesting and successful autumn meetings of the Association, held at Leeds on Oct. 21 and 22. The Committee are greatly indebted to the minister and congregation at Mill Hill Chapel for the generous hospitality shown to the deputation and other friends of the Association. To all who took part in the proceedings they would express their deep gratitude, nor would the Committee forget the visitors from far and near, who by their presence and sympathy made the various meetings so bright and helpful. These opportunities of mutual intercourse and friendship are of great service in strengthening and encouraging Unitarians in their work in different parts of the country.

Association Sunday.—The Committee desire to thank the 192 congregations who last year made collections on behalf of the funds of the Association, and they trust they may rely on the co-operation of these and other congregations to render all the help they can on Association Sunday, which is fixed for Nov. 17. The annual collection affords ministers an opportunity of calling attention to the work of the Association, and many people who are unable to give a large subscription are pleased to contribute something on these occasions. There never was greater need or larger opportunity for the work of the Association than at the present time, and an earnest appeal for assistance is made to all who prize their Unitarian principles and faith.

Deceased Members.—Since the last meeting of the Council, the Committee have to mourn the death of one of their number, Mr. G. L. Bristow, a man noted and beloved for his quiet modesty, his keen intelligence, simple piety, great earnestness of purpose, and large benevolence. He was deeply attached to Unitarianism, which he had adopted as the faith of his mature manhood. Miss J. Durning Smith, through long years of physical suffering, bore about with her a cheerful, patient, and trustful spirit, and her generous gifts in aid of charitable and educational work made her name widely known among philanthropists. She was proud of her Unitarian faith, and there are few of the household who have done more for its intelligent appreciation and propagation throughout the world. Mr. John Troup was one of the Unitarian veterans of London. Many years ago he was a member of the Executive Committee, and until the end of his long and honoured life he never faltered in his allegiance to the Association, nor ceased to give generously of his means towards the support of its work. The Council will desire to place on record its high appreciation of the life and labours of these deceased members, and to express its sympathy with the relatives and friends in the great loss which has befallen them. A faith which has inspired and ennobled such lives as these may well make its appeal to those younger men and women who at present stand aloof, and who might take an active part in supporting the principles and work which the Association exists to uphold and spread.

* The Secretary announced that Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., had that day forwarded a donation of £20 for Auckland.

OBITUARY.

MISS TYRRELL.

WE recorded last week the death, on Oct. 28, of Miss Tyrrell, daughter of the late John Tyrrell (first judge of the East Devon County Court), who had latterly lived at Hornchurch, in Essex. There will be many to whom Miss Tyrrell's name will recall the time when during Dr. Martineau's ministry at Little Portland-street Chapel, and his superintendence of the Portland Sunday-school, she was secretary of the Sunday-school, and herself for years one of the teachers in it, unfailing alike in her punctual presence and her beautiful finish of arrangement, which conduced so materially to the smooth working of the whole institution. With frail health, and hindrances known only to a few, she steadily maintained the high ideal of the work which she always said she had learnt from Dr. Martineau, and for years after he retired from active share in the school life, she continued in the same course of faithful labour. When obliged to give up the school, Miss Tyrrell went to live in the country, first at Addlestone, then at Ightham, and lastly at Hornchurch; and in the latter place she bore with a patience and cheerfulness, which all must honour, the privations and helplessness which were brought on her by an attack of paralysis. Her mind remained perfectly clear to the last, for which she expressed the greatest thankfulness. For those who knew her personally there is no need to speak of what she was. One of these friends wrote a few days ago, "I shall always think of her with reverence," and this expresses the feeling of, perhaps, all who knew her well. There passes away with her life one more link with a past which is very dear to her friends and contemporaries, as it was to herself.

MRS. JULIA CAROLINE SCOTT.

IN the early hours of Monday morning, the 28th ult., there passed away, at her residence in Dunmurry, co. Antrim, Mrs. Julia Caroline Scott, widow of the Rev. Thos. Hugh Marshall Scott, M.A., who was ordained in March, 1866, minister of Dunmurry Remonstrant Congregation, in succession to the Rev. Dr. Montgomery, who had died about three months previously. Mr. Scott spent the remainder of his days in Dunmurry. He died in harness in May, 1895, and thus had entered on his thirtieth year of service in that congregation. In the shadow and sunshine of those years the deceased lady acted the part of a faithful and devoted wife, and during the thirty-five years of her connection with the congregation she evinced such deep interest in its welfare as will cause her death to be keenly felt by the members thereof.

The interment took place on Wednesday, the 30th ult., in the family burying-ground at Dunmurry Meeting House, the service on the occasion being conducted by the Rev. J. A. Kelly, assisted by the Rev. Thos. Dunkerley.

It may be mentioned that Mrs. Scott was the daughter of the late Mr. Alex. Walton (a leading member of Wolverhampton congregation), and a niece of Sir Rowland Hill, of Post Office fame. To mourn her loss she leaves behind two sons and two daughters, the elder of the latter being the wife of Mr. Walter H. Wood, a trustee of the Dudley congregation. Those who had the privilege of being acquainted with Mrs. Scott will not soon forget her, for, to use the words of a friend who wrote on hearing of her death, "She was indeed a good woman, whose worth was proved by many trials, and the memory of her goodness will be a possession for her children."

SERVICES AT HARLESDEN.

SIR,—I am arranging on behalf of the Provincial Assembly a series of Sunday evening services in the Old Court House, Harlesden, commencing on Nov. 17, at seven o'clock. If my information is correct there are several Unitarians living in the neighbourhood. May I ask their co-operation in this movement. Those who can help in the musical part of the service will be much needed, as well as those who can act as wardens, distributing hymn-books and pamphlets, and attending to the comfort of the worshippers. A lady or gentleman who could undertake to play the American organ would render invaluable assistance. The presence of friends will be helpful. Do not let this effort fail from want of practical sympathy. Kindly communicate with me as early as possible, and you may be assured that whatever help you can render will be heartily welcomed.

T. E. M. EDWARDS,
Minister-in-Charge.

22, Knollys-road, Streatham, S.W.
Nov. 5.

P.S.—The Old Court House is in High-street in the centre of Harlesden, and about eight minutes' walk from Willesden Junction.

A MEMORIAL fund is being raised by the Croydon Rescue and Preventive Association as a testimony to the work of their secretary, the late Miss Alice Malleson. It is felt that the most appropriate form of memorial, and the one most in sympathy with her own desires, would be that which would insure the welfare and security of the "homes" for which she had so long and devotedly laboured during the eighteen years of their existence. Friends who would wish to have some part in this memorial should apply for further particulars to Miss Emily Jefferis, hon. sec. of the R. and P. Association, 49, Park Hill-road, Croydon.

ERRATA.—In the Open Letter on the Ministers' Superannuation Fund in our last issue, the subscription voted by the congregation at Ballee appeared as £3 instead of £2. The Tuesday evening lectures arranged by the Humanitarian League to be given at Essex Hall, which we announced last week, are at eight o'clock, not at six.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Clipping of the Church.

Do you know what that means—"the clipping of the church"? My friend, who told me about it, did not; but he was there to see, and then he found out what was meant.

It was a beautiful summer afternoon, in a Gloucestershire village among the Cotswold Hills. Painswick the village is called. The quiet sunshine rested on the old church, and on the meadows and the trees round about. From the hillside you could have seen how all the land was glad in the beautiful light. And in the church there was the sound of singing, for many people were there, and had come from all the country round about to see the "clipping," and to join in the festival. When service was over everyone came outside, and all the children of the village took hands and made a ring right round the little church; and as they circled it the choir walked reverently round in procession, singing festival-hymns. That was the "clipping," and it meant the calling of the church by its name—clepping it. That is an old English word; yclept means called. If you say "Alfred, yclept the Great," that means "Alfred, called the Great." And clepping the church means calling it by its name, or keeping the anniversary of the day when its name was given, and it was dedicated to the service of God. St. Mary's, that little village church is called—after St. Mary it was yclept; and the festival of "clipping" the church is held on St. Mary's day.

It is a very old custom among the villagers, and is said to have been kept for hundreds of years, but had lately been dropped, until this year it was taken up again. We may hope that the children enjoyed their festival. To the onlooker it seemed a picturesque and beautiful observance, carrying back one's thoughts to the primitive village life of long ago.

And we may see in it a parable that all children may take to heart. Those village children took hands round their church, learning, as we may hope, to feel its beauty, to reverence its services, and to love them and it and the heavenly Father to whom they were taught to pray. And that simple act of taking hands round the church might remind them that they all had a duty towards it, to care for it, and do what they could to help. That is a good lesson to learn. Last Saturday, at the opening of a new church at Wood Green, we were told that the children there had joined together to give a beautiful stained-glass window, with a picture of the Good Shepherd in it, the first window of the kind placed in the church. They had not joined hands for the "clipping" of their church, but they had helped to dedicate it. They had for a long time been saving up their pennies, and making sacrifices, joining hands to help, and show their love for the church.

And there are many other ways in which the children can help, as you well know—not only in the church, but in their schools and at home. That picture of the "clipping" of the little village church may help you to think of it. Remember it always means joining hands with gladness, and with love.

VOICES FROM AMERICA.

THERE is a full feast in recent numbers of the Christian Register, in the many admirable papers and addresses at the National Conference of the American "Unitarian and other Christian Churches," held at Saratoga, N.Y., Sept. 23-26. The spirit of hope and courage and of the broadest charity pervaded the meetings, and found manifold expression in the utterances of wise and strong men; most notable was the sense of the necessity for present-day religion to be in touch with social life, to grapple with its problems, and to prove itself a power for betterment, for the hastening of an actual Kingdom of GOD on earth.

In the Unitarian Churches of America we find our nearest kindred in the religious world. We here are often troubled about the Unitarian name as applied to Churches; it seems an awkward name as applied to Free Churches—free in the sense of refusing all dogmatic limitation; and if, as many think, the name as a label cannot be got rid of and is best left alone, the only way seems to be to empty it of all dogmatic meaning. That, if we are to judge from the reports of the National Conference, is what has happened in America.

Thus the President, the Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, in his opening address, made this declaration: "Unitarianism is not a creed. It is a faith and a hope. It is not a faith and a hope merely. It is a quality of character. It is found in all its essentials, in every denomination of Christians. FÉNELON was full of its spirit. It pervades the page of JEREMY TAYLOR and the poetry of VAUGHAN and GEORGE HERBERT. ROBINSON preached it at Delft-Haven. WILLIAM BRADFORD brought it across the water. You can find it sometimes in the early Puritan Church covenants, written and signed by men who builded better than they knew. It is a quality of character. The older I grow, what we call Unitarianism, when I think of it, brings to my mind no statement of doctrine, no negation, no affirmation even, but the thought of men and women whom I have known or whose lives I have read. It is a spirit coming from the mingled breath of many Christian souls of all ages, of many nations, and of many climes—a benignant, tolerant, charitable, cheerful, hopeful, loving, gracious spirit."

What the President there described may be called Unitarianism, if that is taken to mean simply what Unitarians now hold to and cherish. We might as truly call it the essence of spiritual religion, living in the air of freedom; and it certainly is what we desire to cherish in our Free Churches.

And if we ask more definitely what Unitarians teach, we may find the answer in the Rev. CHARLES G. AMES's Retrospect of Unitarianism in the Nineteenth Century. There we read:—

> The heavens and earth of the old spiritual order pass away; but the Christ-message of God's Fatherhood and Man's Sonship climbs and shines like the morning sun. Any conception of God which does not contain these elements, supplied by Jesus, is becoming as impossible to philosophy as to faith. Incarnation or immanence is accepted as the rule, and not as the exception. So, being dead, our prophets still speak.
> "All minds are of one family," says Channing.
> "Man learns to conceive the worship of God only through human relations," says Andrew Peabody.
> "Conscience represents, not the divine frown, but the divine love," says Starr King.
> "God, having made the soul for goodness, is educating it for goodness," says Freeman Clarke.
> "There is a religious faculty in man, and God is its object," says Parker.
> "There is one word greater than Religion, that is Humanity," says Hedge.
> And Bellows—with a voice as of many waters—glories in "the unsectarian sect," which represents "the unitary sweep of all things human into relation with all things divine."
> Not all Unitarian preaching has been equally clear, vital, and coherent, and ringing; but great voices like these have been sounding through the century. And how many have set the high faith and hope to music! The air vibrates to the symphony-notes of Bryant, Longfellow, Emerson, Whittier, Holmes, Lowell, and a whole forest of singing birds.
> But all these were pioneers. No one has claimed that his message was final, God having still provided for better things to come.

In the same spirit the Report of the Council having noted the progress of liberalism, "the drift towards Unitarianism" in all the churches, and the inclination of the more zealous to cry, "We did it!" deprecates that foolish claim, and adds:—

> The true glory of the people called Unitarian is that they were among the first to feel and respond to the breath of a new spirit that had entered the world. They may also make their boast that, in the face of much bitter prejudice, they have done something to help forward the spiritual emancipation of the Church. But the cause of those effects which become more and more startling in our day is, without doubt, that universal spirit whose comings and goings are much beyond human control. . . . It is a great world-movement in which we, like all others, are borne along: only we were among the first to be wrenched from our moorings, and we have now grown somewhat accustomed to spiritual latitudes which still seem strange to most Christian souls.

One of the most welcome papers is that on "The Minister's Adjustment to the New Conditions," by the Rev. WILLIAM C. GANNETT, welcome as every word of his, who gave us "Blessed be Drudgery" and "The Year of Miracle," and other beautiful things out of a poet's heart. In facing the new conditions, Mr. GANNETT says, we must remember that it is still the same man as of old who as minister has still to do the old work. "It is his to interpret Nature and Life in their spiritual aspects, and his to inspire men to live the life of the spirit."

> The mysteries of the universe are still mysteries; the problems of life and of death are unsolved; evil is still here to baffle and stimulate us; human nature, with its weakness, its glory, and its needs, is still human nature; temptation is as old as it is new; sin is still sin—the fall of the man, when he might, had he willed it, have risen; the Moral Law is still sovereign, and salvation and joy on the one hand, retribution on the other, still testify to it; self-surrender is still self-possession, and self-sacrifice still self-development; the Sermon on the Mount holds good; faith, hope, and love still are "these three" and "abide," and the greatest of these still is love; the Christ-life and Paul-life are still types of the highest life; no name for God better than "Father" has been found, unless we intensify "Father" to "Mother"; and the faith fundamental in God is still faith in goodness. These are the central things—all of them old. These are the minister's field of interpretation, and the source of his power to inspire; and these last through from one era or type of civilisation to another.

Of what Mr. GANNETT has to say of our new era, and of how men should be trained to minister to it, we may find another occasion to tell; here we will only add some words of his as to what the minister ought to preach: he says he would go back to EMERSON's great Divinity School Address of 1838: "Preach first soul, and second soul, and evermore soul"; and he adds:—

> I like Dr. Dewey's words, and the saintly face rises in mind as I quote them. "Tell me," said Robert Collyer to Dr. Dewey, eighty-seven years old, "how you would preach other than you have done if you could begin again." He pondered a moment—his voice was broken, but his eyes shone—he lifted his weak hand above his head, and said, "I should try to fill my sermons more and more with faith in the eternal love, the eternal presence and the eternal providence within the eternal laws."

And, further, Gannett says: "Preach the truth far more than the error of orthodox dogmas. Preach the togetherness of churches. Preach the principles rather than the doctrines of the liberal faith—the principles common to liberals of whatever Church name. Do not denominationalise; leave that to the men of the yesterdays. Do not belong to the church supercilious, the church of the raised eyebrows, whether the brows are Episcopalian or Unitarian. And preach hope, preach cheer indomitably."

And certainly he must preach on the social issues of the day, for if he does not, how can he adjust himself to the new conditions of the age? "The great problems of our new day are ethical problems, not theologic, social problems, not philosophic"; and they must be discussed, only in love, in fairness, in humility. "For what else did the God of ethics send him to the pulpit in 1901 but to speak in His name on the aching questions of 1901?" And this he must do, without fear of consequences, and may be assured that people "love the loving prophet, and honour hard honesty." So let him not shrink from his God-given commission, but give heed that he speak the truth in love, and live it out loyally.

DELEGATED TO THE PROTESTANTENBOND.

Sir,—You have expressed the desire to receive from me some account of my visit last week to our Dutch brethren in the faith. And as I went to Holland delegated on behalf of the bodies they represent both by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and by the Council of our National Conference, probably I can best reach through your columns those whom I may for the occasion have the honour of counting my constituents.

Unfortunately, it is many years since I had any practice in the Dutch language, and I found that what slight acquaintance with it I once could boast had almost entirely slipped from me. Thus it was only very meagrely that I was able to follow the general proceedings. But almost every cultivated man or woman I met talked excellent English, and the rest spoke German. And on three occasions addresses in which I was referred to were given in English out of courteous regard for my limitations.

The Protestantenbond is a voluntary union of persons of liberal, progressive, or "modern" religious thought and sentiment from the various Protestant communions. It is probably in the main made up of Remonstrants, but it has a considerable constituency from other quarters, including such absolutely free and unecclesiastical communities as the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz's great Free Congregation at Amsterdam. Every locality has its own branch; and the meetings at Utrecht were the annual gatherings of the delegates from the branches all over Holland.

The actual meetings held were six in number: on the Tuesday the principal business meeting of the Society, a religious service in the old Church of the Huguenots, and a reception to the delegates generally by the Utrecht branch; on the Wednesday a meeting principally for the reading and discussion of papers, a dinner with innumerable toasts, and a general public meeting with further papers and some excellent music.

As for the general aspect of these assemblages, what struck me most was the extraordinary preponderance of men. At the opening meeting, for example, there were about a hundred and forty men, and only, I think, fifteen women. Perhaps this phenomenon—both the ready attendance of the gentlemen and the absence of the ladies—may be partly accounted for by the fact that smoking generally seemed to be quite in order. It was only at the religious service and at the final public meeting that there was no aroma of the weed; and on those occasions there was no marked preponderance of either sex. The meetings seemed to me fine, vigorous gatherings of men thoroughly in earnest, and with a very clear programme—namely, to strengthen everything that is liberal, but above all to see to it that the liberal movement shall have religion as its inspiration and its guide. Speaker after speaker insisted upon this. There is a necessary alliance in many things between our friends and the Social Democrats against the Roman and Calvinistic coalition which has recently come to power in the State. But the Protestantenbond insists, by the mouths of a multitude of speakers, that "the people want religion"; and it is determined that the liberal movement shall be a religious movement too.

As to the actual complexion of the faith of those who constitute the Bond, it appears to me to be absolutely and universally Unitarian. The word, indeed, is no part of their nomenclature. But belief in the simple Fatherhood of God, the pure Humanity of Christ, and the ever-fresh and continuous action of the Divine Spirit on human thought, seemed to me to be the universal presupposition.

Of those utterances which I was able in some part to follow, the opening Presidential Address of my most kind host, Professor de Louter, and the sermon of Dr. P. Heering, a man of stately and venerable mould, and of wide fame as a preacher, impressed me most. The President declared the Bond to be primarily a religious union; secondly, a Christian union; thirdly, a purely Protestant union. "Catholicism is not without historic services, but the Bond seeks no piety apart from freedom. Freedom from authority of priest or letter is the fore-word of all it does. A clear grasp, not of dogmatic opinions, but of the free Christian faith, is the Bond's requirement. The trinity of Christian faith and love and hope is the strength of the free religious life."

The formal reception of the English delegate (who found awaiting him at Utrecht also a commission from Bishop Ferencz to represent the Hungarian Churches) took place at the final meeting. Addressing me in English, the President after some kindly personal words, said: "As a representative of the kindred British and Foreign Unitarian Association, you are cordially welcome to our Protestant Union, notwithstanding the gulf that at this moment separates the two nations. . . . In the depth of bitterness there are gleams of promising light. You, dear sir, and your Association represent the daring minority that are not blinded by the alluring flame of gold and dominion, and bravely defend the true principles of ethics and politics. So we not only tender to you our thrilling hands and throbbing hearts, but we also offer you the tribute of our sympathy and admiration. . . . When you go back, bear to your kinsfolk the sincere esteem we bear to those sons of the brother-nation who dare to face the amazing confusion of moral and religious feeling prevailing nowadays. Tell them we partake of their sorrow and indignation, but we also feel convinced that their now down-trodden principles will once more awake and prove unconquerable."

I have felt bound, Sir, in my ambassadorial capacity to deliver this message straight from the President of the Protestantenbond to the Unitarians of England. In my reply I explained that I had no commission from the bodies I represented to express the sentiments which he attributed to them; and that, whatever my own sentiments might be (which I had other opportunities of expounding), the members of those bodies were widely divided in all that concerns the South African War. But I should not be fulfilling my charge if I did not make it clear to your readers, that there is probably not a single member of the Protestantenbond who can for a moment conceive a liberal and religious Englishman approving of the attitude and conduct of England. I was publicly told that if I personally had been one who approved the war, the Protestantenbond would not have accorded me its hospitality. It was clear that there could be no ethical or spiritual communion between these men—professors, clergymen, lawyers, men of business—and those who have advocated and defended the course in which England is engaged.

Indeed, the universality of the topic of the war in public meeting, in religious service, in private conversation was in the highest degree impressive—impressive and profoundly painful. Men representing the highest types of intellectual and religious culture spoke with deep emotion of the love and reverence they had always felt for England as the friend of small nationalities, the champion of human freedom—a sentiment now utterly broken and destroyed. I report simply what I saw and heard; I offer no explanation; I express here no opinion as to the justice of this tremendous and most sad revulsion.

Of private hospitality and friendly intercourse I enjoyed an abundant share. I visited Mr. Hugenholtz at Amsterdam, and Miss Knappert, Professor Eerdmans, and Professor Tiele at Leyden; and Professor Eerdmans and the young Norwegian, Professor Kristensen, Tiele's successor, and nephew to Björnson, took me a delightful trip to The Hague and Scheveningen. May I visit these kind friends again in happier times!

Liverpool, Nov. 5.

FOR THE MAGNANIMITY OF ENGLAND.

SIR,—The somewhat despairing cry which you allowed me to utter in your columns three weeks ago—a cry for mercy towards two little States which, according to official and newspaper reports, England has not only conquered but annexed—has been well silenced by your correspondents. Writers of most widely differing opinions, as to the main issue, practically agree in dismissing my appeal. Nor have I any reason to be surprised, perhaps, or any right to complain. You see, I was speaking, in my foolish simplicity, entirely from the religious point of view. I was thinking of that religion, charged with the ethics of Christianity, which so many in this country profess to hold. And this being my concern, let me confess that it was a little surprising to find oneself accused of that great transgression—"the interference of parsons with politics"—against which, as one of your correspondents assures us, there is "a steady objection." (May I be allowed to assure him that there is no such "steady objection" against the interference of laymen with religion!)

I could not help asking you to let me utter my plaintive cry. Hardly could one dare to hope that any such appeal would affect the course of events now. Only there is the future to think of, and the terrible results to an ethical religion which the present state of things may produce in after time; and one may be pardoned for thinking that every heart-broken prayer for some recognition of the spirit of meekness and gentleness in human things might do something to mitigate the remembered horrors of a strife so cruel and relentless. But it looks as if it were better to break one's heart in silence, and weep in lonely sorrow the tears of patriotic remorse.

After reading all the letters of your correspondents, and then looking again at my own, I must admit that a sort of unpremeditated irony seemed to pervade it. But, in truth, I simply wished to take for granted, what most English people seem to believe—viz., that our cause is just and that our victory is sure—and to ask if this were not an occasion to show also that our heart is generous. It is asserted that both Right and Might are on our side. Be it so. Then now is the opportunity for magnanimous treatment of the conquered erring ones. We have a religion whose distinctive ethical elements are sympathy and compassion, a willingness to forgive injuries, a desire on the part of the strong, not to suppress the erring and the weak, but to love them and minister to them. Pride, hatred, revenge, masterful control of others for personal or national gain—these things are absolutely alien to the spirit of that religion. If, then, believing that Right and Might are with us, we would allow this Christian temper to prevail over passion, or fear, or greed, or whatever on either side keeps up the woeful strife, should we not go to these fighting enemies of ours and, out of noble pity for them and our own harassed and suffering soldiers and fellow-countrymen there, demand a cessation of hostilities and enter into friendly conference with their leaders, and try to understand them and to make them understand us, and so devise some terms of peace which should secure the future and save the present from more and worse disaster? This is absurd and impossible, it will be said, in the present state of feeling in England, and with such men as we have at the head of its affairs. It may be so. I only contend that this is what the ethics of our religion would prompt us to, if we could hear its voice and feel the breath of its spirit on our hearts.

In face of all that your correspondents have urged, I still believe that now is just the time when a great nation might extend to its foes, if not "magnanimity" in any of those subtle meanings which Mr. Wicksteed has defined, yet a generous, compassionate, determined resolve to find terms of peace whereby the horrors of strife should be brought to a speedy and merciful end. So confused are the issues which have led to this war that it may be impossible to "do justly," because we cannot see what justice is; but it may not be impossible to "love mercy," and so once more to learn to "walk humbly with our God"—if, indeed the Deity we serve is not the Hebrew "God of battles," but the gentler Divinity of Jesus, "whose nature and whose name is Love."

W. J. JUPP.

[We have received several other letters on the South African War, controverting the position taken up by Mr. Smith Osler last week, and pointing out the fallacy in the "Wales, Liverpool," analogy. If space permits, we may publish one of these next week.—ED. INQ.]

UNITY CHURCH, WOOD GREEN.

OPENING SERVICE AND MEETING.

THE announcement of the opening of the new church at Wood Green, which was issued as a supplement to THE INQUIRER of Oct. 19, contained a drawing of the block of buildings raised by the Unitarians of that northern suburb of the metropolis during the past eleven years. Wood Green lies to the north of Finsbury Park, in the near neighbourhood of the Alexandra Palace, and has a large and increasing population. Early in 1890 some lectures were given in the Wood Green Assembly Rooms, in which the late Walter Mawer took part; and in June of that year the Rev. T. W. Freckelton, having just left Unity Church, Islington, undertook to conduct services regularly for three months. These were thenceforward continued, and, after a move to the Wood Green Institute, which proved unsuitable, the congregation, now properly organised, with Mr. J. Sudbery as their energetic secretary, determined to acquire land and erect a building of their own. In November, 1891, Unity Hall was opened, and the Rev. J. S. Mummery, Ph.D., who had previously been at Peckham, entered on his ministry, now crowned by the erection of the new church and the loyal devotion of a united congregation. Unity Hall cost £900, and the whole plot of land £462, which was to have been paid off in twenty years; but with the help of a bazaar, which left £100 surplus after paying for the Hall, the land was cleared in three years, and two years later a further building was added, with accommodation for smaller meetings, at a cost of £516. Then came the great London Bazaar and the establishment of the Permanent Chapel Building Fund, which opened the way for the completion of the scheme and the building of Unity Church. The whole cost has been something over £3,000. Of this the Building Fund supplies £1,000, on loan to be repaid in twenty-two years, the grace of two years being allowed before repayment begins. A donation of £500 was also made from the Bazaar Fund, and the congregation has raised over £600, while other friends (with £100 from the B. and F. U.A.) have already given or promised more than another £600, and the collection at the opening service realised £30. Roughly speaking, therefore, it may be said that there remains a deficit of £300 still to be provided for; and friends of the cause, seeing what the congregation has accomplished, and what they have to prepare for to pay off their loan, may well consider whether they will not at once take a share in the good work by making an end of that.

The picture of the buildings above referred to shows the progress of the work. Unity Hall is a modest little building, but with its annexe admirably adapted for lectures and various kinds of social work. The new church, with its promise of a larger future, overshadows the earlier buildings with its ampler proportions and more stately form, and can fitly hold its own with the White Hart-lane Board-schools, which stand opposite. It is to be hoped that the town will grow in the direction of the Unity settlement, for it stands off the main road, and is at present flanked on one side by open ground.

The church, which is planned to seat 330 people, and of which Mr. J. C. S. Mummery, a son of the minister, is the architect, is built of red brick, in a style not wanting in dignity and reminiscent of mediæval German churches, surmounted by a cupola and with a fine open roof. The lighting, and we should say also the ventilation, has been skilfully managed. At one end of the church there is a large traceried window, and at the other end, facing the congregation, is the organ on a raised platform, with room for speakers in front, and on one side, the pulpit. From the level of the platform on either side further cross benches are arranged for the choir and others. On the wall at each side of the organ, also facing the congregation, are large portraits in oils of the late Dr. Martineau and Dr. Mummery. As to these, it is a matter of feeling, but we should strongly urge that the more fitting place for such portraits would be in the lecture-hall, the constant living-room of the congregation, where its habitual social activities will be carried on, and its home-gatherings will take place, rather than in the church, immediately facing the congregation in the hour of worship.

THE DEDICATION SERVICE.

Unity Church was opened on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, the service of dedication, commencing at four o'clock, being conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth. The church was completely filled by a congregation, which included representatives of our community from all parts of London. The service, which was enriched by anthems rendered by the choir, opened with Bryant's well-known hymn for the dedication of a church, and closed with Rinckart's "Now thank we all our God." The sermon was from Micah vi. 8, "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God." It dealt with the revelation of goodness, of which we must be assured in every aspect of our life, and especially in its highest, where justice, mercy, and reverence must prevail, both in individuals and society. Through the solemn claim of duty God requires goodness of us, for "we needs must love the highest when we see it." And in another sense that must be said to be the requirement of man, for these things—justice, mercy, reverence—he requires, if he is to be a man. So in the name of Justice, Mercy, Reverence, they were met to hallow that place; but it was already hallowed by the devotion of those who had persevered in their faithful efforts until that crowning day, who, not seeing, had believed, and were willing to spend and be spent in the service. And there would be more and more of the sense of hallowing as day after day, and generation after generation, holy and humble men of heart gathered there, and the tried and troubled found a new peace, mourners received new courage to believe in the eternal mercies of the Lord, the Giver of life and death, and sunny-faced children grew up to be strong men and women and lead others upward in their turn. The sermon concluded with a prayer that the blessing of the Giver of all light might rest upon the congregation, that they might humbly walk in His strength, loving the thing that is right, and glorifying the Father, who is in heaven.

THE EVENING MEETING.

After the service friends were hospitably entertained by the congregation, tea being served in the hall, and an organ recital being afterwards given in the church before the public meeting. At seven o'clock the chair was taken in the church by Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., who had also presided at the opening of Unity Hall in 1891. After an opening hymn, the Secretary announced a number of letters, regretting absence, and read some passages from them—from Mr. Joseph Howard, M.P., member for the division, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Messrs. Frederick Nettlefold, S. S. Tayler, and H. Epps, and the Revs. T. W. Freckelton (who had been the first to conduct regular services for the congregation), W. Copeland Bowie, G. D. Hicks, and H. W. Perris.

At this point it was announced that a window which had been given by the children and teachers of the Sunday-school would be unveiled by Mrs. Blake Odgers. The window, which is by the chief entrance, contains a representation of the Good Shepherd, bearing a lamb upon his shoulders, and an inscription stating by whom it was given. After the unveiling, brilliant magnesium light was burnt outside, so that the window could be well seen by those in the church.

Mrs. BLAKE ODGERS, before unveiling the window, said that it was the gift of the children and their teachers. For many months the children had brought their pennies, their own pennies, not their parents', to save them up for that gift. Some had made real sacrifices for it, and she hoped that would be for them a beginning of making sacrifices for their church. It was a sign that the Sunday-school felt its responsibility for the church, and desired to be associated with that work from the first. It was a happy augury for the future of church and school.

The CHAIRMAN, after the unveiling ceremony, gave an address, in which he dwelt upon the great principles to which that church was dedicated, the unfettered search for God's truth, with liberty, unhindered by limits of prescribed doctrine, for each one to read the Bible for himself and to study the ways of God in the world and in history. With individual conviction there must also be liberty to proclaim the truth, to teach it to their children and to the people round about them, to teach it fearlessly and reverently, and with consideration for the convictions of others. While they had no final creed they had very definite convictions, but with faith in the progress of God's truth, and openness to all new light. The trust of that church was open, being simply for the worship of Almighty God. In their pursuit of truth they did not neglect the teachings of the past. They were united as Unitarian Christians, and learnt of Jesus and the prophets, apostles and martyrs of former times, and living teachers in many churches in their own time. Their church would be devoted also to the use and service of mankind, it would work for others and seek to be a power for good in the world. They held to the faith which Browning expressed in the line, "God's in His heaven, All's right with the world," and they would add "God's in His earth," as could be seen in the progress of mankind. They must lay stress on the great lessons of the life and death of Jesus, in his true humanity, and dedicate their church to the worship of God, our Father. They were very sure of God, they would therefore never despair of man.

Mr. J. SUDBERY, the Secretary of the church, then made a statement as to the progress of the movement, and their present financial position (particulars of which are given at the beginning of this report), and pointed out how greatly they benefited by the help of the Permanent Chapel Building Fund, and that the example of their church, in its progressive growth, might be followed in other suburbs of London.

The Rev. Dr. MUMMERY expressed his delight that their building scheme had been carried out. It had been possible because the members of their church had proved themselves, like the man whom Horace described, as tenax propositi. They were a self-willed people, but they had consecrated that will to the highest service. Their church was dedicated to the love of God, a lofty Christ-ideal of life, the service of man and the everlasting progress of man. Their faith, as he knew from his own experience, was that which alone could give substantial rest to the heart tossed on the sea of doubt. That new building would be an ornament to the neighbourhood, but it must not be only an ornament. It must be a centre of living work, that should regenerate at least that part of the world in which it was placed.

On the motion of Councillor COWAN, Chairman of the Church Committee, seconded by Mr. JAMES KING, Treasurer, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Sudbery, for his untiring services as Secretary of the church from the beginning, crowned by the event of that day. Mr. SUDBERY acknowledged the vote, and paid a tribute to the united energy and zeal of the whole Committee.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON, President of the Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties, proposed, and Councillor HOLDING seconded, and Mr. CHARLES SMITH supported, a vote of thanks to Mr. Tarrant for his services that day.

The Rev. W. WOODING offered the congratulations of the Newington Green congregation and the other North London churches, and proposed a vote of thanks to the architect, of whose work very warm appreciation was expressed. This was seconded by Mr. T. H. TERRY, Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, and supported by the Rev. F. W. STANLEY. Mr. MUMMERY, in his reply, expressed their obligations to the thorough workmanship of Mr. James Pocock, the builder. The thanksgiving hymn from the afternoon service having been once more sung, the meeting was brought to a close.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE quarterly meeting of this Association was held at Poole on Tuesday, Oct. 29, among those present being Mr. J. Cogan Conway, President; the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, C. C. Coe, C. E. Pike, E. C. Bennett, T. Bond, C. A. Hoddinott, and E. S. Anthony; Messrs. H. Blessley, G. C. Prior, F. Pinnock, R. Belben, E. J. Wilkins, and W. Carter.

A meeting of the Executive was held in the afternoon, the PRESIDENT in the chair, when, after several matters of detail had been settled, a discussion took place on a resolution proposed by Rev. E. S. ANTHONY, and seconded by Rev. C. C. COE, designed to make the Association representative of the churches of the district rather than individual subscribers as at present. The resolution was finally adopted as a recommendation to the next annual meeting.

After tea in the school-room, a public meeting was held in the chapel, under the presidency of Mr. WILLIAM CARTER. Mr. V. Tchertkoff, of Christchurch, was among those present, in addition to the above-named.

The CHAIRMAN, having read a telegram from Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, regretting his inability to be present, and hoping that the Superannuation Fund would be materially aided, proceeded to speak of the work of their Association.

It was, he said, a hundred years old, and had done a great deal of useful work in its time. They were always trying to increase its sphere of usefulness, and with this object in view they had decided to hold public meetings in connection with their quarterly gatherings, so that they might be able to associate more with one another and promote their principles.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER then gave an address on the Ministers' Superannuation Fund, the origination of which, he said, was due to Mr. Cogan Conway. To complete the capital sum of £20,000 which they required to make a beginning with the Fund, they had now only £3,000 more to raise, and he urged the churches to subscribe as generously as they could. He knew that the Southern Association had been engaged in raising a twentieth-century fund, amounting to a thousand pounds, for the promotion of the cause in the district covered by the Association. That was a great achievement, but he hoped it would not stop the flow of generosity in relation to their scheme, which he very earnestly advocated.

The CHAIRMAN submitted a resolution to the effect that the meeting, believing that the establishment of a Ministers' Superannuation Fund would prove of the utmost importance to the welfare both of ministers and congregations, earnestly commended to the churches of the Southern Unitarian Association the scheme adopted by the National Conference at Leicester in 1900.

Mr. COGAN CONWAY seconded the resolution, expressing the great interest he had always taken in the movement. Nothing in the history of their cause had been so astonishing as the hearty way in which this scheme of Superannuation had been carried through, and he attributed it to the activity thrown into it by Mr. Carpenter. He expressed the opinion that the whole of the money required would be raised by the end of the year.

The resolution was put and carried unanimously, the CHAIRMAN remarking that having adopted the scheme, he hoped they would show their practical interest in it.

Mr. CARPENTER said that Mr. Carter had shown his interest in a practical form, having that day given him a cheque for £100.

Mr. TCHERTKOFF was the next speaker, and expressed the great thankfulness he had experienced since living in England at finding amongst the body of Christians, who called themselves Unitarians, people with whom he could associate spiritually. He acknowledged the brotherly feeling that had been manifested towards him, although he had not professed any belief in common with them.

The Rev. E. C. BENNETT spoke of the Evangelical Mission about to be held at Southampton, and the great need of work of an Evangelical character being done by their denomination.

The Rev. C. E. PIKE also briefly addressed the meeting on missionary work which had been done by the Association, and what he hoped it would do.

The proceedings were brought to a close by the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. E. S. Anthony.

Subsequently there was a religious service, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

I AM often asked by friends: "Well, how is the work prospering among the churches of the Assembly?" This is not an easy question to answer, because one can never fully estimate spiritual results. Financial and statistical reports are not a true standard by which churches can be judged. We would not speak lightly of tangible and material results, but we do protest against spiritual work being measured by figures and money. While our churches may not be numerically strong, they may be exercising an influence far-reaching, and exceeding that of larger communities, in enlarging men's conceptions of truth, and in broadening human sympathies. That our churches do not make a deeper visible and tangible impression on the neighbourhoods in which they are located is not very surprising when we remember that they have to contend not only with strong prejudices and gross misrepresentations, but with a stolid indifference to all religious beliefs and observances. The former they will have quietly to "live down," but the religious indifferentism which is so prevalent is a more serious foe to meet. Unorganised and inert, it forms a mass of resistance heavy to be moved. Open unbelief may frown forbiddingly, like some embattled fortress, requiring only a frontal attack to capture. But these dull earthworks of indifference—no brilliant charge will take them, and no sudden onslaught, however vigorous and united. Shot and shell rain down upon them without apparent effect. Patiently, and with barrow-loads, we must be willing to cart them away. It is slow work, and requires a large amount of persevering faith. This quiet, plodding work has in it, however, the promise of final success.

In all our progressive movements we can scarcely expect to advance without having sometimes to retreat; we may occupy positions for a time which it is wise to quit. We may seek to establish congregations in neighbourhoods that look promising, but it would be foolish to remain if, after a fair trial, there is no adequate response from the people. It does not follow that we have failed because no organised church has been established. We have delivered our message and have sowed the good seed of the Kingdom, and must be content to leave results to the working of those spiritual laws which divine wisdom has ordained. The Assembly has always been ready to aid the efforts of individuals and churches in spreading the knowledge of the great principles of our religious faith, but its constituency would rightly condemn the action of the executive if it were continually bolstering up efforts which honest judgment must pronounce against. To attempt to keep them in a struggling condition of existence would be detrimental to the progress of our common cause and the interests of true religion. The little congregations gathered at Ramsgate, Margate and Eastbourne, by the personal missionary zeal of the late Rev. R. Spears and Miss Burkitt, have had a chequered history, and as there was no prospect of development the public services have been discontinued.

With reference to the other churches of the Province there is nothing but steady and faithful work to record. Some have suffered severe losses of staunch supporters whom the hand of Death has smitten down, and from the removal of friends to other districts. These are among the discouragements which make the work at times very trying; but through sunshine and shade the witness-bearing goes on for a larger Christianity than Orthodoxy can offer.

The church at Bessell's Green is now vacant through the resignation of the Rev. R. C. Dendy, who has accepted the pastorate at Plymouth. The congregation is small, but an energetic minister who would throw himself heart and soul into mission work would find plenty of scope in Sevenoaks, which is about a mile distant. Chelmsford has reverted to the plan of supplying its own pulpit, with the assistance of lay preachers from the Assembly. Mr. Harry resigned the pastorate in June. Liberal religion does not find here a very congenial soil. The Rev. J. Felstead accepted the temporary pastorate of the church at Lewes at the beginning of the year, and is continuing his services, which are much appreciated by the congregation. The Rev. G. Lansdowne, of Billingshurst, has been carrying on for some time mission work in a neighbouring village with very gratifying results. The movement is full of promise, and shows that Unitarianism is adapted to all classes of the community. Similar efforts were attempted in a suburb of Hastings by the Rev. Gardner Preston, which aroused the opposition of the local clergymen of the Established Church, and eventually prevented all the lectures being delivered in the Sandown Board School. Arrangements are being made for a further course of lectures in the Clive Vale district. If all our churches would undertake this kind of work, they would not be so self-centred, which accounts in no small degree for the lack of spiritual prosperity. At Southend, under the ministry of Mr. C. F. Dear, the congregation has steadily increased, and the prospects are most hopeful. Halstead, which was transferred from the Eastern Union to the Provincial Assembly, is now doing well. The attendance at the service is seldom below forty, and has on special occasions reached 120. The church at Reading is still without a pastor; its various organisations are vigorously maintained. The Sunday services are frequently conducted by one of their local friends. Plans have been adopted for the building of a much needed school-room, and the work has already been commenced. The congregation has raised about £250 towards the required amount of £720. Appeals have been issued for financial help. Several friends have generously responded, but the treasurer, Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, would be glad to receive further donations, so that the building may be opened free of debt at the beginning of the New Year.

A letter has already appeared in your columns dealing with the London churches, but I should like to say a few words in relation to two or three. For ten years the Rev. A. J. Marchant has been labouring at Deptford amid surroundings of the most depressing character. The chapel stands where poverty and squalor and drunkenness find a home. Those who attend the services are mostly very poor, but they are very attached to the minister and the place, and render what little help is possible for them. The failure of certain trust funds, on which the minister's stipend largely depends, is a serious matter for the pastor, who has had of late increased claims arising from prolonged domestic affliction. The needs of the neighbourhood are great, and Mr. Marchant is deserving of the warmest practical sympathy. Special temporary arrangements have been made for the church at Walthamstow, founded by the late Rev. R. Spears. Through the removal from the district of nearly all the principal workers in connection with the church, the Sunday-school and all other institutions have suffered severely, so that it was found necessary to obtain ministerial help other than I could render with several churches under my care, and, through the generosity of two friends, this help has been obtained.

During October Mr. J. Ewart, M.A., of Manchester College, took charge of the work, and rendered very efficient service. The Rev. W. H. Rose, late of Great Hucklow, is now in charge until the end of February. He has already by his earnestness and genial manner excited a good deal of enthusiasm among the people, and the condition of the church is now more hopeful than at any previous period of its history. At Bermondsey the Assembly, by timely intervention, prevented the closing of the church. The London District Unitarian Society had decided to discontinue their grant, and the trustees felt their inability to assume the responsibility. There was no other alternative but to close the church, and this would have taken place had not the Assembly resolved to carry on the services until some plan could be devised for the future. It did not seem right that a congregation of twenty-five adults, a Sunday-school of 100 children, and a Band of Hope of fifty children should be left without a spiritual home. A youths' club has been recommenced, and fifty youths above the age of thirteen have been enrolled; and each week fresh applicants have to be refused from want of accommodation. It is hoped that some plan will be adopted for the development of the work at Bermondsey on the broadest possible lines for the spiritual and social life of the neighbourhood.

Arrangements are being made for a series of Sunday evening services at Harlesden, in the old Court House, commencing on 17th inst. The district is an extension of Willesden, where several Unitarians have taken up their abode. Their co-operation is earnestly invited, so that by their presence and help they may contribute to the success of the effort. If a little more enthusiasm could be kindled in the hearts of Unitarians in relation to propagandist work, existing churches would be strengthened and new centres established. To many Unitarianism is a kind of luxury to be selfishly enjoyed, and no thought is cherished as to the privilege and duty of helping others into the same freedom which they prize so highly themselves. The pressing need of our churches is not money, but earnest, vigorous, expansive spiritual life which will find expression in consecration of time and service to the advancement of the Kingdom of God in our large towns and country districts.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—The forty-second anniversary was celebrated on Sunday, when the Rev. E. A. Voysey, of Burnley, preached special sermons afternoon and evening, which were thoroughly appreciated. In the morning Mr. Voysey gave an address to parents and scholars in the church.

Birkenhead.—The Band of Hope, founded thirty years ago, still retains amongst its officers four of its original promoters. The entertainment on Tuesday last comprised a temperance address by the Chairman, Mr. John Embury, vocal and instrumental music, and recitations, concluding with a dialogue, entitled "Alcohol and the Doctor."

Blackley.—On Saturday last, Nov. 2, the first entertainment (opening of the winter series) was held in the new school. Mr. John Harwood delighted the large audience with one of his miscellaneous programmes, grave, gay, and humourous sketches being blended, so as to make a thoroughly enjoyable evening.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—The annual congregational soirée was held at the Hannah More Hall, Park-street, on Friday evening, Nov. 1, and was largely attended and much enjoyed. In introducing the evening's programme of music, to which was added a bioscope exhibition, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford gave a brief address. He welcomed them, he said, heartily, though briefly—welcomed them in their numbers, in their youth, in that trust and faith and in those principles which for generation upon generation had been associated with their venerable house of prayer in Lewin's Mead. One of the prominent features of that gathering was the youthfulness of the audience he was addressing, and with that thought he expressed his gratitude to the Sunday-school teachers. After referring to the developments of Lewin's Mead, he said that gathering was an interlude in their serious work. Their religion was a power in their lives, uplifting them day by day. He expressed the hope that that happy gathering would be the omen of a winter's successful work.

Chelmsford.—The congregation has sustained heavy loss by the death of Mrs. F. C. Hickley, the sister of Mr. A. Madocks, the indefatigable secretary. Coming to the town at an early age as housekeeper to her widowed brother, she was connected with the church from its foundation in 1879. She was foremost in every effort to promote its efficiency, and her benevolence and generosity were well known and appreciated among its members. As far as in her lay, she lived a quiet, peaceful, non-contentious life; it was a practical commentary on the old Bible text: "Study to be quiet and to mind your own business, and to work with your own hands." After a painful illness, during which she was to the last more solicitous for the comfort of others than her own, she passed peacefully away on Oct. 24, and was interred in the Borough Cemetery, in the presence of a large company of relatives and friends on Oct. 29, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards officiating. Memorial services were held, and special sermons preached in Legg-street Church by Mr. C. F. Dear, of Southend, on Sunday, 3rd inst.

Derby.—On Sunday week a special service was held in Friargate Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. K. Smith, of Belper, when a stained-glass window placed in the chapel by the congregation in memory of the late Mrs. Birks, wife of their minister, the Rev. John Birks, was dedicated. Mrs. Birks had greatly endeared herself to the congregation, and had been specially devoted to the work of the Sunday-school. The window, which in the centre represents Jesus blessing the children, bears the following inscription:—"To the Glory of God, and in loving memory of Matilda, the beloved wife of the Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., minister of this chapel, in recognition of 17 years devoted service in the life and work of the congregation."

London: Forest Gate.—The services on Sunday last were conducted by Mr. Wilkes Smith, of Richmond, Mr. Perris having visited Hull to lecture to the Hull Literary Club. On the previous Wednesday Mr. Perris lectured before the West Ham and District Educational Conference on "Theory and Practice in the School."

London: Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E.—The thirty-fourth annual meeting of past and present scholars of Spicer-street and Mansford-street was held on Wednesday last. In spite of the unfavourable weather there was a large attendance. The Rev. W. G. Cadman, on behalf of the present teachers, gave a welcome to the visitors. Mr. J. G. Foster, Secretary of the Church and Mission, also spoke, referring, among other things, to the tablet to the memory of the Rev. C. L. Corkran, about to be placed in the chapel, and asking for the usual contributions of old scholars to the poors' purse of the mission. A programme was contributed by various friends, and a most enjoyable evening was spent. The preceding Wednesday a large congregation assembled in the church to hear a performance of The Messiah, kindly rendered by members of the Kyrle Society. Dr. Turpin presided at the organ.

Newton Abbot.—The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie preached on Sunday evening last on "The Old Faith and the New," when there was a large and very appreciative congregation. A first collection on behalf of the B. and F. U. A. was made. On Monday the Devonshire ministers held their autumnal meeting in the chapel at four o'clock, and this was followed by tea in the Public Rooms, the old meeting place of the congregation, when upwards of a hundred friends partook. After tea a public meeting in the chapel was presided over by the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, minister-in-charge, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie spoke on "A Unitarian View of the Bible," and addresses were also given by the Revs. J. Worthington, R. C. Dendy, A. Lancaster, T. Reed, and A. E. O'Connor. All who recollect Mr. Bowie's previous visit two years ago, and contrast the attendance at the meeting then and now, will feel convinced that this latest outpost of Unitarianism in Devonshire is determined to hold its own.

North Lancashire.—The project for the formation of a North Lancashire Unitarian Congregation and Sunday School Union has been advanced a stage. Since the Preston congregations met and appointed its delegates, the congregations at Lancaster, Blackpool (north and south), Kendal, and Chorley have taken a similar step. The date of the conference has been fixed for Nov. 16, in the Preston Chapel, when a paper on the subject will be read by Mr. Newell, of Preston.

Reading.—The memorial-stone of the new schoolroom of the Unitarian Free Church was laid by Mrs. O. A. Shrubsole on Wednesday. The want of such a room has long been seriously felt. The congregation have, therefore, made a determined effort with sufficient success to justify the commencement of the work, but funds are still urgently needed. The ceremony was of a simple character, it being thought better to have a more public opening of the school when it is finished. The stone having been duly laid, Mr. O. A. Shrubsole said that the new school would be the natural completion of the work taken in hand twenty-five years ago. The Church had various needs, and they were building that room, not merely that the Sunday-school might have a suitable home, but that other activities might take root, and the common life of the church be strengthened. The school would be on the same open trust as the church—consecrated to truth, to freedom, to progress. Mr. G. R. Smith added words of congratulation and of appreciation of the services of Mr. and Mrs. Shrubsole in connection with the church. After a few words from Mr. W. Haynes, a short devotional meeting was held in the church, and the proceedings terminated with the singing of the hymn, "Part in peace." The school is of red brick, and will adjoin the church. It is from the designs of Mr. W. Jane. The principal room will seat about 150.

Rotherham.—On Wednesday evening, Oct. 30, the opening lecture of the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union was given in the old schoolroom, Down's-row, by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, of Mansfield, the subject being "English Pictures," illustrated by a large number of reproductions of famous pictures, shown by lantern. The lecture was very warmly appreciated, and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Fripp. The Mayor was to have presided, as he did over the first lecture of last year's course, but owing to pressure of municipal business his place had to be taken by Councillor Cox, who is a Wesleyan local preacher, to whom a vote of thanks was passed, on the motion of the Rev. W. Stephens.

Taunton.—On Thursday, Oct. 31, the recognition of the Rev. G. V. Crook, a son of a former President of the Wesleyan Conference, as minister of Mary-street Chapel, took place. Service was held in the afternoon, and there was a large congregation, which included the Mayor, and the Rev. J. Jenkin, Chairman of the Taunton Wesleyan Circuit. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. J. Wain, after which the Rev. A. N. Blatchford delivered the charge to the minister, and Mr. G. Philpott offered him a welcome on behalf of the congregation. The Rev. G. V. Crook responding, said that hereditary causes often had much to do with human lives and the steps which people took in life. The fact that he was descended from a Protestant French Huguenot who was driven from his native land for conscience sake had probably something to do with his being there that afternoon. Coming as he did from a long line of Nonconformists, those who would allow no State or Church to dictate their form of worship, had also probably something to do with his being there. The Wesleyan Church, from which he had seceded, held a decidedly Arminian creed, but a higher type of life had been revealed to him by his Heavenly Father through the revelation of Jesus Christ. He believed in character rather than in doctrine, and he had long felt and stated that he could not teach the doctrine of eternal punishment. A great deal of correspondence passed between Dr. Martineau and himself, and at last he seceded from the Wesleyans because the growing light seemed to conflict with the belief which he then held. He had now accepted what he considered to be the true conception of the Christian life—liberty to follow where the truth should lead. Standing on the platform of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of the universal race, they might feel that God was indeed their Eternal Father. His great endeavour would be to go on until he might come at length to the perfect man in the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers then delivered a charge to the congregation, and the service was brought to a close. After tea a public meeting was held in the schoolroom, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers in the chair. Among the letters of regret for absence was one from the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington, late minister of the congregation, now of Cullompton, and the Rev. J. B. Shute, Wesleyan minister, of Taunton, who sent his best wishes for Mr. Crook's success. The Chairman, in the course of his address, related how his own grandparents, who resided at Flushing, Cornwall, were driven from the Wesleyan denomination in 1824 because of their religious belief, and said he felt a new thrill of sympathy with their minister and his wife because of the old link between himself and Wesleyanism. Mr. Charles Goodland, J.P., proposed, and Mr. Edward Goodland seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to the ministers for their services that day, and addresses were given by the Revs. J. Wain, T. B. Broadrick, A. N. Blatchford, and others.

West Bromwich (Resignation).—At the end of December the Rev. F. A. Homer terminates his engagement with this congregation, after a little over three years' of useful labour. In the spring he will leave for Canada for the benefit of his health. By the initiative of Mr. Homer the church is being redecorated, and a new heating apparatus laid down, at a cost of about £120. A large portion of this amount has already been secured by Mr. Homer's own efforts, for which the congregation are much indebted.

Wolverhampton.—On Tuesday, Oct. 29, the autumnal conference of the Midland Christian Union was held in this town. At the afternoon meeting in the schoolroom, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., of Hackney, read a paper entitled "The Obligations of the Pulpit to the Pew," which was much appreciated, and the following gentlemen took part in the discussion :—The Revs. A. A. Charlesworth, J. B. Higham, L. P. Jacks, J. C. Street, and F. W. Turland ; and Messrs. H. New (Chairman), and H. E. Perry. Tea, provided by the congregation, was partaken of in the Co-operative Hall, after which, in the same hall, a public service was held, the preacher being the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, of Liverpool. The Rev. J. B. Higham and his congregation are vigorously carrying on their work at Wolverhampton. Several members of the Committee have themselves constructed a new platform in the iron schoolroom, and re-erected the rostrum from the old Snow Hill Church. Negotiations are now proceeding towards the erection of a temporary church on the new site.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

OBJECT.—To aid Ministers who are Members of the Conference to obtain Old Age Pensions.

A capital sum of £20,000 and a yearly income of £300 in subscriptions are required to meet the needs of insurers at the outset, and provide for the gradual increase in their number during the first ten or fifteen years.

Of this sum of £20,000, upwards of £15,000 has now been promised, and it is earnestly hoped that the remaining £3,000, to secure the two promises of the last £2,000, will be subscribed before the end of the year, so as to enable the Managers to establish the working of the scheme. Cheques and promises to be sent to the Acting Treasurer at No. 63, Bishopsgate-street Within, London, E.C.

TREASURERS:—DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., The Flosh, Cleator, Cumberland.
HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE, Esq., 63, Bishopsgate-street Within, London, E.C.

HON. SEC.—J. COGAN CONWAY, Esq., Ringwood, Hants, to whom inquiries may be addressed.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE are asked to inform our readers that it is intended next week to forward the contributions received on behalf of the building of the new Unitarian church at Auckland, New Zealand, of which the Rev. W. Jellie, B.A., is minister, so that the gifts from the mother country may reach the congregation there by Christmas. The sum of £213 has now been received, and the B. and F.U.A. have added £50. Will not at least fifty other people join in helping on this good work, so that £400 may be sent out to Auckland? The following sums have been received since the last appeal appeared in the columns of THE INQUIRER: — A Friend from Newark-on-Trent, £2; Mrs. L. M. Aspland, £5 5s.; Mrs. Bayle Bernard, £1; Lady Bowring, £1 1s.; Mr. G. W. Brown, £5; Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., £20; Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, £2 2s.; Mr. E. Clephan, £5; Mr. H. W. Gair, £5; Miss L. K. Garrett, £3 3s.; Mr. John Harrison, £5 5s.; Mr. J. Arthur Kenrick, £10; Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, £5; Miss A. J. Lawrence, £10; Miss E. L. Lister, £1 1s.; Rev. H. M. Livens, £1 1s.; Mr. Henry Lupton, £2 2s.; Miss Mary Martineau, £1 1s.; Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, £2 2s.; Mr. J. T. Preston, £2 2s.; Mr. William Rathbone, £10; Mrs. Henry Rutt, £5 5s.; Mr. Francis Taylor, £5; Mr. J. E. Taylor, £3. Further donations will be received and acknowledged by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

AT a meeting of the Committee of the "Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches," held at Lewin's Mead, Bristol, on Tuesday, Nov. 12, the President, Mr. William Walker, of Trowbridge, in the chair, it was cordially resolved to lend the support of the Society to any efforts that may be made in the Western district, in furtherance of the scheme for the National Conference Ministers' Superannuation Fund. It will be seen from the report from Newcastle-on-Tyne in our "News from the Churches" column that an important meeting in connection with this movement was also held in that city on Friday, Nov. 8, when an address was given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. A resolution of approval and practical support of the scheme was passed by the representatives of the churches of the Northumberland and Durham Association.

MANY readers throughout the country will share in the pleasure of the members of the London District Unitarian Society, that the portrait of Mr. David Martineau, by Mr. Arthur Hacker, A.R.A., which was presented to him on Wednesday evening, is so successful, and not unworthy to take its place among the other portraits treasured in his family. The presentation was made at the autumnal meeting of the Society, which Mr. Martineau had served as treasurer for so many years, and of which he now is President. A report of the proceedings will be found in our present issue.

THE INQUIRER'S reference last week to the Unitarian name as applied to Free Churches was criticised at the meeting of the London District Unitarian Society on Wednesday evening. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie said that he did not agree with THE INQUIRER that our American brethren have emptied the name of all meaning. But that is not what we said. Our contention was that if the Unitarian name is to be applied to Free Churches it must be emptied of all dogmatic meaning, and we proceeded to quote the statement of the President of the American National Conference, as to what Unitarianism is, which, as we said, appeared to be simply "the essence of spiritual religion, living in the air of freedom." Mr. Bowie also in his speech, if we are not mistaken, treated the name in exactly the way in which we had said it must be treated, if applied to our churches.

WE are, however, far from wishing to raise another academic discussion on this subject. The Rev. J. E. Stronge, at the L.D.U.S. meeting, deprecated such idle discussion, but immediately devoted a good part of his speech to that very process, and ran a tilt at "Free Catholic," which we have affirmed to be ideally the exact name of our churches. But we have not urged it as in the present condition of our church life within the range of practical politics. Our immediate duty is to attend not to names but to the real things of the religious life, and, if it may be, to get a little more of the power of genuine religion into our churches. There is no other way of solving any of our problems.

THE Faculty of Protestant Theology in the University of Paris inaugurated the new session on Monday week, with an address by Professor Ménégoz, Dean of the Faculty, which was devoted chiefly to a tribute to his distinguished predecessor, the late Auguste Sabatier. At the conclusion of his address, Professor Ménégoz announced that he had felt it his duty to resign the office of Dean of the Faculty, that he might devote himself to his other duties as Director of the Séminaire, and further that Professor Stapfer had been unanimously nominated Dean. Professor Raoul Allier subsequently gave a public lecture on "Tartuffe and Religion." Sabatier's successor in the Chair of Dogmatic Theology (of the Reformed Church) is M. Jean Monnier, a pupil and enthusiastic follower of the late Dean's. It is a State appointment, but follows the nomination of the Consistories of the Reformed Church. The result of the voting throughout the country showed sixty-two Consistories for M. Monnier, and thirty-nine for M. Bertrand, the other candidate, who represented the more strictly orthodox Evangelical wing of the Church. M. Monnier's election is a victory for true Liberalism in the Church, a large section of the moderate Evangelicals uniting with the left wing to form a strong party for tolerance and comprehension in the Church. Sabatier's place cannot be easily filled, but there is every promise that Professor Monnier will maintain the high tradition of Liberalism in his teaching.

THE Bench of Bishops is greatly strengthened by Lord Salisbury's appointment of Canon Gore to Worcester, though London will be poorer by the loss of one of its most distinguished preachers. Charles Gore was born in 1853, and educated at Harrow, and Balliol College, Oxford. Taking orders, he soon became known as a distinguished High Churchman. The publication of "Lux Mundi," with his essay on "Inspiration," in 1890, marked a striking movement of liberal thought in that school, and in the following year he was Bampton lecturer. He was appointed Canon of Westminster in 1894. Canon Gore has been one of the bravest of churchmen in his practical interest in social questions, and this courage and devotion, no less than his preaching power, will be a great acquisition to the diocese of Worcester.

AMONGST the recipients of the King's birthday honours we notice the name of Sidney Preston, Esq., Chief Engineer and Secretary to the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjaub, as having conferred upon him the Companionship of the Order of the Indian Empire. He is the third son of Mr. Joseph T. Preston, a Vice-President of the B. and F. Unitarian Association, and the London District Unitarian Society. Mr. Sidney Preston has been for nearly thirty years in India, in the Irrigation Department, and during that period has assisted in bringing into cultivation, by means of canals, thousands of acres of unprofitable land, giving employment and homes to a vast number of the natives. The funds have been provided by Government, but the land yields a good interest for the money expended. Mr. Preston has recently had a further recognition of his services, having, we understand, been appointed by the Viceroy a member of the Provincial Legislative Assembly of the Punjaub.

IT will be seen from an advertisement in another column that next Thursday evening Dr. G. Dawes Hicks is to give the first of a course of eight lectures in the schoolroom of Unity Church, Islington, on "English Philosophy in the Nineteenth Century," the course to be continued on alternate Thursdays. The lectures will be elementary in character, forming an introduction to modern philosophical literature, including studies of the teaching of such men as Bentham and the two Mills, Bain and Sidgwick, Hamilton and Mansel, Spencer, Huxley, Clifford, Leslie Stephen, Martineau, T. H. Green, Bradley, and Caird. Dr. Hicks' courses last year on "The Beginnings of Philosophy" and in the previous year on "Kant" were much appreciated, and the present course promises to be of even greater and more immediate interest.

THE Rev. John Ellis, secretary of the National Conference Guilds' Union, has addressed a circular to all the Guilds and Young Peoples' Societies connected with our churches, which are known to him, in the following terms :—

The Council of the above Union has decided to issue a Year-book which will give (1) Information as to existing Guilds ; (2) Hints as to the formation of Guilds ; (3) Suggestions for Bible Study ; (4) Topics for Guild Meetings ; (5) Golden Sayings for each day of the month.

Mr. Ellis then asks for information from each of the Guilds or Societies, as to their place and name, the secretary, the day and hour of meeting, the number of members, the methods employed, and any particulars as to special work. Any societies which have not received the circular are requested to send answers to these questions to the Rev. J. Ellis, Pisgah House, Broomhill, Sheffield.

THE November number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains the sermon preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove on the Sunday following the Leeds Musical Festival, its subject being "Music—an Echo of the Eternal Harmony." Eloquently the preacher speaks of the divine power of music amid all the evil of this world, quoting from Browning's "Abt Vogler," and concluding with the plea that we should all sing, with the voice, if we can, and in any case, "make melody of life and heart to God." The Pulpit is now in its tenth year, from 600 to 1,000 copies being issued each month, sustained by the contributions of the congregation. In his Chapel Record Mr. Hargrove says: "The average cost of a sermon is about twopence. I have to thank those whose kindly generosity enables me to sell them at a penny, which is the largest sum the public is disposed to give for literature of this kind."

WE publish this week some Italian notes by the Rev. Tony André, minister of the Reformed Evangelical Church of Florence, whose acquaintance we had the pleasure of making during the International Council Meetings in Whit-week, and whose paper on "The Liberal Movement in Italy" will be found in the volume of the Proceedings of the Council. Mr. André, since his return home, has added to the duties of his pastorate the teaching of Hebrew Grammar and Archæology in the Waldensian Divinity College, Florence.

IN the Daily Graphic of Nov. 8 there were some interesting illustrations and an article on the "Schools for Crippled Children" established by the London School Board. A fuller illustrated article on the same subject appeared in the Municipal Journal of Sept. 13. Mrs. Humphry Ward has been the pioneer of this beneficent work. Crippled children had been previously classed with the mentally deficient, to the serious disadvantage of both, while very many were neglected altogether. But two years ago Mrs. Ward established a school at the Passmore Edwards Institute, specially devoted to crippled children, who were collected daily by an ambulance and brought to the school and taken home again, while during school hours they had not only skilled teaching but the care of a trained nurse, and in summer time could be for hours out in the garden. This demonstration of what could be done led to the London School Board obtaining powers from Parliament to establish schools for the accommodation of all such children in their area, of whom inquiry showed that there are as many as 1800. There are already two schools established, in Paddington and Bethnal Green, with all the invalid appliances and the ambulance for bringing the children in, and others will in due time follow, until the whole need is met.

MISS KATE GREENAWAY, the well-known artist and illustrator of children's books, died last week at the age of fifty-five. Mr. M. H. Spielman, writing in the Daily Graphic of Nov. 8, noted that Continental critics gave her a very high rank among British artists, as possessed of true creative power. Ruskin also, in his "Art of England," devoted a lecture (that on "Fairy Land") to her and Mrs. Allingham. And further, Mr. Spielman says :—

All who love childhood, even though they may not be blessed with the full measure of her insight and sympathy, all who love the fields and flowers and the brightness of healthy and sunny natures will feel, as they read the headline of this brief tribute, that there has gone one who has a claim on the nation's regard and upon the love of a whole generation. She was the Children's Champion, the Baby's Friend, who stood absolutely alone in her relations with the public. Randolph Caldecott laboured to amuse the little ones ; Mr. Walter Crane to entertain them. They aimed at interesting children in their drawings ; but Kate Greenaway interested us in the children. She taught us more of the charm of their ways than we had seen before ; she showed us their graces, proved to us that their faults were but the characteristics of tender years, and delighted us with their dainty quaintness, and made us happier at her own happiness in them. "You have," said Ruskin, "the radiance and innocence of reinstated infant divinity showered again among the flowers of English meadows." So when we realised how Kate Greenaway's love for children was so unalloyed, that it alone prompted the delicacy of her pencil, and her eye so kind that it was blind to faults which perhaps, as she insisted, may not be faults at all, she made us love children all the more, and her drawings too, for their teaching and their loveliness, and herself not less, for having made them.

IN the November number of Harper's Magazine the story by Miss Mary E. Williams, "The Portion of Labour," is concluded, and it is announced (in the Athenæum) that the new volume, which begins with December, will contain a new novel by Mrs. Humphry Ward. In the article this month on "Old St. Saviour's, Southwark, the Elizabethan Actors' Church," there are a number of good illustrations, including the Chaucer and Shakespeare windows, and the Emerson monument, which bears the following inscription on a bronze tablet :—

Here under lyeth the body of William Emerson, who lived and died an honest man. He departed out of this life the 27th of January anno domini 1575, in the year of his age 92.

These Southwark Emersons are said to be the ancessors of Ralph Waldo Emerson. The last page of this number is occupied by a very amusing conceit of Oliver Herford's on "The Dachshund," with a portrait in four divisions, and a poem telling of his mythical origin. Old Testament students should turn to this.

THAT lantern services can be made religiously impressive and really helpful, especially to simple-minded folk, has been abundantly proved, and the great value of the black-board, when used by a skilful teacher, is well known. But when it comes to a "Chalk-Talk Preacher," in a fashionable Calvary Baptist Church in Brooklyn, where the congregation, as we were told in a recent number of the Strand Magazine, "are so satiated with both social and religious novelties that it is a most difficult thing for a pastor to interest them," then surely we have reached a low depth in the degradation of the pulpit. The minister of this church is said to have great skill in drawing, and with a huge black-board in his pulpit, he will sometimes execute as many as ten pictures in coloured chalks during his morning sermon, and in the evening he sometimes preaches the whole sermon by a succession of drawings, without uttering a word. For the children of the Sunday-school that might well be admirable, but that a fashionable congregation, presumably of some intelligence, should have to be so fed and pampered, in order to "interest" them, would be incredible if we did not know something of the lengths to which people will go in search of a new sensation.

MANSFIELD BICENTENARY.

ADDRESS BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER ON THE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT WHICH LED TO THE FOUNDING OF THE OLD MEETING HOUSE, MANSFIELD, 1701.

THE English Presbyterians who built your Meeting House two hundred years ago cherished a theology widely different from that which your pastor will expound to you in the discourses in which he is about shortly to sum up his view of the fundamental dealings of God with man. How is it, then, that we are in possession of their chapel, and that you trace your spiritual lineage in unbroken descent from the ministries of Robert Porter and Samuel Coates, and from the generous provision of Robert and Charity Sylvester? The answer is to be found in the character of the movement in which the rearing of this sanctuary was an episode. It owed its character largely to the genius of one man, Richard Baxter, who powerfully impressed upon it two fundamental ideas—the idea of comprehension, and the idea of non-subscription. From these it derived its distinctive notes; by these it was separated altogether from the Presbyterianism of the Long Parliament, the Westminster Confession, and the Solemn League and Covenant.

Baxter was born in 1615 on the banks of the Severn. His parents were known as serious persons, but devoted to Church and King. "There was never," says Baxter proudly, "the least savour of Nonconformity in our family." He grew up a student not only of his Bible, but of Church history, and in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch (who died about 107 A.D.) he saw the natural issue of the organisation of the early Church described in the New Testament. This led him at once away from the high doctrines of prelacy advanced in the Church under Charles. He acknowledged the validity of Presbyterian ordination. He asserted the identity in kind of both the authority and the duties of all Christian pastors; but he had no objection to what was known as episcopacy of order, to the appointment of certain clergymen called bishops to be overseers of their brethren in particular districts. He attached importance to the gift of prayer, but was willing to combine extempore utterance with liturgical form; and he had none of the sensitive jealousy of the interference of the civil magistrate in ecclesiastical matters characteristic of Scottish Presbyterianism. On these lines he hoped for the establishment of a national Church in a sense different from the famous Ordinance of Cromwell in 1653. He and his friends longed for an organisation that should cover the whole people, and were not satisfied with the Congregationalism of the Protector and the Independents. They not only welcomed, therefore, but they actively promoted, the Restoration. As soon as the new King reached London, ten or twelve of their leaders—among them being Baxter, Bates, Calamy, Manton, Reynolds—were appointed Royal chaplains. They lost no time in formulating their proposals, which went so far as to include a modified episcopacy on the basis of Archbishop Ussher's scheme first drafted in 1640, twenty years before.

Baxter's own views were wider still. As far back as 1650 he had declared that "two things had set the church on fire, and been the plague of it for a thousand years, first enlarging our creed and making more fundamentals than ever God made; and, second, composing and so imposing our creeds and confessions in our own words and phrases." He stood, therefore, for the broadest liberty on a scriptural base. "We would have had the brethren," he says in his own Memoirs, "to have offered to Parliament the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Decalogue as essentials and fundamentals. And whereas it was said a Socinian or a Papist would subscribe all this, I answered, 'So much the better, and so much the fitter is it to be the matter of our concord.'"

But the prelates saw their opportunity, and would concede nothing. In a convulsion of loyalty Parliament next year recalled the Bishops to the House of Lords, and in 1662 passed the Act of Uniformity which is still the charter of the privileges of the Establishment. The issue we all know. When Lord Chamberlain Manchester told the King that he was afraid that the terms were so hard that many of the ministers would not comply with them, "I am afraid they will," replied Bishop Sheldon. His grace had underestimated the strength of principle. The immortal Two Thousand surrendered their pulpits and abandoned their homes, and Nonconformity became a permanent factor in English religious life.

Comprehension, however, was still the fundamental idea of Baxter and the English Presbyterians. Not all their sufferings at the hands of the Church could dull their ardour or quench their desire for inclusion. The shameful legislation, Conventicle and Five Mile Acts, awoke no wrath or resentment; they were endured with dignified silence. The aristocratic connections and influence of the Presbyterians induced the King to make an effort to reconcile them in 1667, but Baxter and Manton would accept no terms which would not include the Independents as well as themselves; and on this ground the Government would make no concession. When the Indulgence of 1672 was issued, Baxter disliked the arbitrary exercise of Royal power, and was slow to take advantage of the new opportunity. He finally consented to have a license procured for him, but he stipulated that it should describe him neither as Presbyterian nor as Independent, nor by any other party name; he would only be called a simple Nonconformist. So unwilling was he to take up an attitude of antagonism that he declared in the pulpit, shortly before the licenses were revoked, that it was not in opposition to the public churches that he kept up a meeting, but to help the people in their necessity, who were many more than the parish churches could hold.

The persecution had naturally begotten an intense earnestness. In the seven years, 1666-1672, Oliver Heywood reckoned in the West Riding that he preached 436 week-day sermons, kept 151 fasts and 38 days of thanksgiving, and travelled 5,028 miles. In your own parish, the sympathy of the Vicar, and the fact that Mansfield was not a corporate borough, enabled a number of ministers to make their residence there. They would not give up their claim to the services of the church. They lived, we are told, "in hearty love and concord with the Vicar, for he counted it no schism for them to help his people in their way to heaven. And they by their friendly concourse with him, and frequent hearing of him, manifested that they had no design to lessen him in the esteem and affection of his parishioners." Baxter, therefore, could truly write in 1683, "We abhor schism and have laboured to heal the wounds of the Church with all our power these twenty-two years and more."

The age of chapel-building for Nonconformity had not yet begun. A few meeting-houses, like that at Mill Hill, Leeds, were built after the Indulgence of 1672. But the English Presbyterians, like Wesley in the next century, were unwilling to take any steps that would definitely separate them from their brethren within the fold. In 1689, Baxter emphatically asserted, "We are for making true religion as national and extensive as may be, and for a national Church; though we abhor the casting out of all that be not of our opinion and that cannot submit to all that I here enumerate, which I and others of my mind can submit to." It was the year of the Toleration Act, which very nearly witnessed the passing of another Bill that would have given the Presbyterians, at least, all that they desired. A Comprehension Bill was actually carried through the House of Lords, and a commission was appointed consisting of ten bishops and twenty divines to prepare a scheme. The initiative lay with Tillotson (Archbishop of Canterbury) and Stillingfleet. The Primate's plan included the indifference of ceremonies, revision of the Prayer-book, and alteration of the terms of subscription. The Commission recommended startling reforms, which, had they been adopted, would have made the sacramental movement of the last half century impossible. "Priest" was to be altered everywhere to "minister." The use of the surplice was made optional. The Athanasian Creed was explained so as to minimise the damnatory clause. No communicant should be obliged to receive the elements kneeling. No minister need use the sign of the cross in baptism. The absolution was changed. Ordination by presbyteries was acknowledged as valid, and the words of the service which now ascribe the gift of the Holy Ghost to a bishop were altered into a prayer; the Commissioners remarking (in the spirit of the late Dr. Hatch) that "the form then (and now) in use in the Church of England was imported into the service in the darkest times of popery." For a little while the goal seemed close at hand. Danger began when the recommendations of the Commissioners were referred to Convocation. The Upper House was conciliatory, but the violence of the Lower wrecked the scheme, and it was never revived.

The Presbyterians who had refused to accept terms which would not also include their brethren of the Congregational way, found themselves finally shut out. They still, indeed, especially the London ministers, advocated the practice of attending the church services and taking the sacrament. But "Occasional Conformity," as it was called, lashed by Defoe (himself of Presbyterian origin) in controversy with Howe, came slowly and silently to an end. A few of the Nonconformists tried to persuade themselves that the Act of Toleration, by giving Parliamentary recognition to their separate meetings, conferred on them the status of establishment. When the Lord

Mayor of London, Sir Humphrey Edwin, in 1697, "carried the sword with him to a nasty conventicle held in one of the city halls" (I cite the complaint of Dr. Nichols), "the horrid crime was defended by one of his own party giving this arrogant reason for it, that by the Act of Parliament by which they have their liberties, their religion was as much established as ours." It would be easy to show that in the technical sense this contention was incorrect; but it supplies a pathetic witness to the desire of the Presbyterians to be regarded as still somehow sharing in the national religious life.

It was only, then, when all hope of inclusion had disappeared, that the erection of chapels in any considerable numbers began. It is difficult to form any exact estimate of the actual strength of the several religious parties. Returns made under an Order in Council, 1688, reckon the Conformists at 2,500,000, and the Nonconformists at only 110,000. The latter figure is certainly below the mark; perhaps almost as much as Defoe's bold exaggeration, 2,000,000, is above it. According to a Parliamentary return, in the years 1688-1700 no less than 2,418 licences for places of worship were obtained. The movement, therefore, was widespread and active. Men might shake their heads and talk of "the decay of the Dissenting interest," but the heroic labours of a generation before now bore their natural fruits. The English Presbyterians had never been able to maintain any ecclesiastical discipline. In their foundations, consequently, they were as completely congregational as the Independents. The alliance which Baxter had so firmly maintained with them was now frequently consolidated by the dedication of their chapels "for the worship of God by Protestant Dissenters." Sometimes the Presbyterians were specified (as at Cross-street, Manchester); sometimes the Independents; and sometimes they were united in fraternal partnership. One fundamental principle, however, was usually understood, and sometimes definitely formulated—the principle which we sum up briefly in the term "open trust." The idea of comprehension, which the Presbyterians had only by this time reluctantly abandoned, had never been founded upon the notion of uniformity either in belief or in practice. Its basis was laid in Scripture. There lay the rule of faith and life. But amid the possible diversities of interpretation no one Church had the right to lay down laws for any other. When Edmund Calamy was revolving at Oxford, in 1691, whether he should seek Anglican or Presbyterian orders, he thus describes how he solved his problem:—

> I with care read over the articles, liturgies, homilies, and canons of the Church of England, which contain the English impositions, and weighed the terms of Conformity as the law had settled them, and found several things required which, after the strictest search and inquiry I was able to make, I did not perceive God had given any men power or commission to impose upon others, or discern how my compliance could be proved a proper duty. . . . Finding the peace of the Church the grand argument for compliance with the impositions prescribed, I naturally considered that also, and found that if carried too far it would infallibly bring a sort of spiritual slavery into the Church which I could not perceive I was any more obliged to encourage, countenance, or support, than civil slavery in the State. Upon this foot I determined for nonconformity.

And when the hour arrived, three years later, Calamy insisted that he should be ordained "a minister of the Church of Christ without any confinement."

In this respect the Presbyterians had dimly conceived of a spiritual union transcending that either of the ecclesiastical organisation or the popular philosophy of their day. In the year of Toleration Locke had laid it down that the Church is a thing absolutely separate and distinct from the Commonwealth. It could only be regarded as a free and voluntary society. No man, he argued, by nature is bound to any particular church or sect, "everyone joins himself voluntarily to that society in which he believes that he has found that profession and worship which is truly acceptable to God." A number of sects existing side by side seemed the only alternative to the old uniformity. The Presbyterians had, I think, a wider ideal. Beneath outward diversity they felt the note of a deeper harmony, expressing itself not in identities of doctrine but in sympathies of worship and trust. When Francis Tallents opened the new meeting-house at Shrewsbury in 1691, he caused it to be written on the walls that it was built "not for a faction or a party, but for the promotion of repentance and faith in communion with all that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." Nathaniel Oldfield, of Southwark (who died in 1696), was "for no other terms of church communion than the terms of our common Christianity"; and he declared himself of one church with all those whom he hoped to meet in heaven. In 1700 Samuel Bury (first of Bury St. Edmunds, and then of Lewin's Mead, Bristol) could utter the aspiration "Let religion itself in its own latitude be the common bond of all union." And Timothy Jollie, of Sheffield, preaching the funeral sermon for his father, said that they "reserved to themselves liberty to reform according to Scripture rule, in doctrine, discipline, and worship."*

On these lines, however, the Presbyterians did but maintain at the end of the century the principles which the Independents had worked out at the beginning. Prophetic indeed were the oft-quoted words with which John Robinson bade farewell to the pilgrims about to sail in the Mayflower, 1620: "I charge you before God that you follow me no further than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ. If God reveal anything to you by any other instrument of His, be as ready to receive it as you were to receive any truth by my ministry. For I am verily persuaded that the Lord hath more truth yet to break forth out of His holy word." And with no less insight did Milton assert in 1644: "He who thinks we are to pitch our tent here, and have attained the utmost prospect of reformation that the mortal glass wherein we contemplate can show us, till we come to the beatific vision, that man by his very opinion declares that he is yet far short of truth." The true comprehension, indeed, has yet to come. It will not be formal, but so much the more hope is there that it will be real. For it will be achieved not by the abandonment of theological differences, but by the recognition of the fact that behind all differences lie common spiritual aims; by the perception that religion, like life, must needs express itself in various types; by the acknowledgment that all these spring from one source in the mingling of the divine and human thought; by the discernment that all who are led by the Spirit of God are indeed His sons, heirs of God, and, if they will have it so, joint-heirs with Christ. To this comprehension, which already exists in the sphere of devotion, as our hymn-books testify, the sacramentalist and the evangelical and the rationalist will one day attain; and when it is realised, the Catholic union for which Baxter never ceased to pray will be fulfilled.

* These passages will be found cited by Dr. Martineau in an article entitled "The Living God in Changing Creeds," in the Theol. Rev. 1866, p. 296.

THE REV. JOSEPH BULL.

At the recent Bicentenary celebration at Mansfield, the Rev. E. I. Fripp referred to the Rev. Joseph Bull (Bristowe)—not John as our report had it—minister at Mansfield at the beginning of the last century.

Mr. Fripp spoke of the controversial character of his ministry, quoted a few lines from some contemporary verses in which Mr. Bull is ridiculed, called him this "Mad Bull," and stated that he was the first to call the Old Meeting House by the name Unitarian Chapel. A correspondent, very loyal to the Unitarian name, feeling that scant justice was done to Mr. Bull, has sent us the following notice of his life:—Mr. Bull was in all respects an estimable divine, unless, of course, his pronounced Unitarianism is to be reckoned against him. He was brought up under the ministry of the Rev. Benjamin Carpenter, of Stourbridge, and was a student at Manchester Academy (1798-1800), under the Rev. George Walker, F.R.S., formerly of Nottingham. Mansfield was his first charge, and there he remained eleven years. After this he was minister at Hinckley, and subsequently, on account of his health, he removed to Ringwood, where he resided twenty-three years. He next ministered for some time at Topsham, in Devonshire, and in 1848 was invited to Shepton Mallet, where he continued, as his obituary notice in the Christian Reformer says, "in the active discharge of his pastoral duties," till he died in 1854, at the age of eighty, after a ministerial career of nearly sixty years, "much regarded by his people." "Though so far advanced in life," the notice goes on, "he preached with great energy, and gave himself to the work of the flourishing Sunday Schools connected with the chapel to the last, and those to whom he ministered gratefully testify that he did whatever he could for their moral and spiritual welfare." To the last "he kept up his interest in all that bore upon the progress and improvement of the world."

Mr. Bull (Bristowe) was a Unitarian of the School of Priestley, and when he came to Nottinghamshire did his best to spread the faith in which he earnestly believed. He was contemporary with the Rev. James Tayler (the father of John James Tayler), who was the first to preach Unitarianism at the High Pavement, and whose name and memory are still revered among us.

The verse quoted by Mr. Fripp is from a very scurrilous rhyming "Address," published in 1810 by a bitter theological opponent. The special cause of the attack upon Mr. Bull by this versifier was a sermon on the "Unity of God," preached in 1809 at Mansfield, and later at Nottingham, in which Mr. Bull denied both the Diety of Christ and the existence of a Devil, sins of apparently almost equal magnitude in the eyes of his orthodox critic.

IN MEMORIAM: HARRIET MEURICOFFRE, BY HER SISTER, JOSEPHINE BUTLER.

These records, Mrs. Butler tells us, do not pretend, in any sense, to be a biography. Her own powers are not at present equal to such a work, which would be founded on memories that reach back over nearly three-score years and ten, and would have many and varied historical interests, for Mme. Meuricoffre's life was rich in events, closely interwoven with the liberation of her adopted country, Italy, in a stirring epoch in which, as far as Naples was concerned, she took an actively beneficent part in 1860 and the following years.

This book,* which is "affectionately dedicated to Mme. Meuricoffre's children and grandchildren," is chiefly a selection from her correspondence, but it throws a strong sidelight on the events in which she figured largely, as a good angel, in the Garibaldian episode when the monstrous tyranny of Bomba was put an end to and Victor Emmanuel proclaimed King of United Italy by his generous champion.

On other occasions of stress and trial in Naples Mme. Meuricoffre and her husband came to the rescue of the sufferers with wise and good effect. These are the main subjects of the book, but there are also several letters giving most graphic and picturesque accounts of the writer's travels in Switzerland, Italy, the Tyrol and elsewhere. There is a brief sketch of her early life which can be supplemented from Mrs. Butler's "Life of John Grey of Dilston," their father, published by H. S. King and Co. in 1874, and further particulars from her "Recollections of George Butler," not less interesting and valuable, published more recently by Simpkin, Marshall and Co.

Mr. Grey had charge of the Greenwich Hospital estates in Northumberland and Cumberland, an important post, and he brought up his family, of six daughters and three sons, in a beautiful and ideal country home in that borderland. Between Josephine and Harriet there was a special friendship which was but slightly interrupted by the marriage of the latter, and seemed to increase in depth as life advanced and its vital human interests deepened.

Harriet's husband, Mr. Tell Meuricoffre, though Swiss by nationality, was a member of a wealthy banking firm, long resident in Naples. He was in every way worthy of his noble wife. One of the public notices of him records:—

> The life of Chevalier Meuricoffre was a very full and varied and most interesting one. Swiss by parentage, he was born and lived almost all his life in Naples, where he fulfilled some of the highest citizen functions in a manner to attract the esteem of his fellow-citizens, of every nationality and creed. He was the head and support of the Swiss Protestant colony in Naples—a very numerous society—and the promoter of countless good works. Truth, purity, uprightness, single-mindedness, and a most munificent generosity were among his characteristics. Noblesse oblige seemed to be his motto. He did not let his left hand know what his right hand did.

On the day of his interment, in 1900, all public offices were closed, a vast concourse of citizens, of every class, followed the procession to the cemetery. A Roman Catholic notice of Mr. Meuricoffre concludes with these words: "May eternal repose, and the rich reward he merits be granted to this pure and beautiful soul."

Space will not admit of the picturesque description of their beautiful home at Naples and of their not less beautiful Swiss home, La Gordonne, sloping down to the Lake Geneva. We must limit ourselves to the points of public interest. Having seen something of the tyranny of Bomba and his son, one can imagine with what joy they, with all lovers of liberty, greeted Garibaldi, on his arrival from Sicily, in 1860, with his irregular army, soon to be joined by the English brigade of volunteers. The fighting did not last very long, but Mme. Meuricoffre and her sister-in-law found plenty of work in the hospitals which were very poorly provided with the simplest necessaries. She distributed tea and sugar, &c., but the little present at which all the British faces brightened was a great lump of brown soap for each man. They exclaimed, "Now won't we have a wash!" A ward in Sant' Apostoli Hospital was given in charge to the Meuricoffre ladies, but they managed to penetrate much farther and distributed blankets, sheets, and other needfuls, shirts and shoes, where wanted. They introduced order, cleanliness, and regularity, and checked, wherever it was possible, the thieving propensities of the officials and the hospital staff, who constantly appropriated and carried off both money and material generously contributed by wealthy Neapolitans.

Not the least valuable part of the work was taking charge of the orphaned children, and providing new homes for them amongst the compatriots of the fallen. Mme. Meuricoffre speaks most enthusiastically of the deliverer. She writes to her father, August, 1860:—"I have seen to-day the face of Garibaldi, and now all the devotion of his friends is made clear to me; you have only to look into his face and you feel that there is, perhaps, the one man in the world in whose service you would, taking your heart in your hand, follow blindfold to death—a man exalted and sanctified, as it were, by his own single-minded devotion to and faith in a holy cause. . . . One could love the cause without seeing him, but in seeing him you seem to be suddenly gifted with the power of seeing it as he sees it, and you love it better for his sake, while you wholly honour and admire him for its sake."

The arrival of the King is vividly described; the Messrs. Meuricoffre were invited to assist at the consecration ceremony at the cathedral. The ladies witnessed the procession, along the length of the Toledo. "Presently there came a carriage, with four fine horses, Victor Emmanuel sitting on the right hand, Garibaldi on the left, his noble face beaming with quiet restful satisfaction at bringing his King in triumph." The account Mme. Meuricoffre gives of the dungeons at the fortress of St. Elmo, now thrown open, of the horrors of the Bourbon tyranny and the woes which the political prisoners had endured, is most thrilling.

We must pass over the letters referring to the meetings of the sisters on successive occasions and happy family gatherings.

In April, 1872, there occurred a great eruption of Vesuvius which is vividly described. Though many fled from the frightful scene the Meuricoffres remained and gave what help they could to the poor people whose houses were engulphed. And of a later catastrophe Mrs. Butler writes:—

> In 1883 the terrible earthquake on the island of Ischia, in the bay of Naples, took place. The whole Meuricoffre family worked, in various ways, for the relief of the survivors of that tragic event. My sister took and sheltered, in the court of her house, a number of the orphan children whose parents had perished. She gives many touching episodes, instances of the strong and passionate domestic affections of these poor Ischia people.

Again,—

> In the year of the outbreak of cholera in Naples, in 1884, when every one who could afford it was flying from that stricken city, my sister and her husband, who were at that time visiting her old home on the borders of Scotland, immediately started to return to Naples, leaving their sons at school in England. . . . My sister's account of the appearance of Naples as they entered it was very striking. It will be remembered that King Humbert visited Naples, during the cholera, very much against the advice of his physicians. He went to the hospitals and spoke words of cheer to the sick and dying. My sister mentioned to him the good effect which his action had had on the spirits of the people and expressed her own respect for his courage, to which he replied: "I am only the servant of my people."

Then follow twelve closely-printed pages, notes from a journal, written by Mme. Meuricoffre to her daughter in England, describing her visits to the hospitals, her interviews with the sisters in charge, and many cases in which she came to the rescue of the orphan children, through all which trying experiences her saintly spirit sustained her. The recital is of intense human interest. "In the early months of 1885," Mrs. Butler records, "my husband and I visited Naples. We spent some delightful weeks with my sister and her family, and had the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the good works they had inaugurated at Naples, or which had been promoted by their influence; among others the International Hospital, which was initiated by Mr. Meuricoffre, and of which he was the first president. I also went with my sister several times to the Sailors' Rest, of which she was the promoter and supporter for many years. It has been wonderfully blessed, and its practical usefulness attested by reports, issued by three successive British Consuls, residing in Naples, who asserted that disorderly conduct of every kind diminished and even ceased to exist among the British sailors of that port."

"In a former work, 'Recollections of George Butler,' I have given some account of a visit which my husband and I paid to Naples, in 1889, and of the sweet hospitality of the Meuricoffre family. In 1899 my sister and her husband came to Switzerland when I was there, and I had the happiness of being near them, Tell Meuricoffre became seriously ill, and in the autumn was taken back by easy stages to their home in Naples, where he died March, 1900." Not many months later Harriet Meuricoffre passed away in her beautiful Swiss home, where her children laid her in the humble cemetery adjoining the grounds. On her grave are the words: "Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee."

FOR THE MAGNANIMITY OF ENGLAND.

Sir,—So many issues have been raised by Mr. Jupp's plea for magnanimity of conduct that it seems impossible to deal with them all. Perhaps no war we have ever been engaged in has involved so many and such complicated questions. I will ask leave to deal with one point only. One, at least, of your correspondents appears openly to scorn magnanimity among nations, and calls upon us to consider the desolate homes in England and her colonies and the two South African States, that are the fruit of a magnanimous policy which has been tried and failed. But does anyone deny that Mr. Gladstone's policy greatly increased the loyalty of the Cape Dutch, and that it was followed by a closer and more friendly connection between the Cape and Natal and the two Republics? I was under the impression that we had a change of government and of policy since that time.

There was nothing particularly generous or magnanimous on either side in the negotiations between Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Kruger that ended in war. It appeared to me that each of them was simply trying to get the better of the other. Any great principle will fail if both parties in the transaction give it up. But that is no argument against constant and unwearied attempts to revert to it, unless we are prepared to believe that God only accepts nobility of mind and action in individuals and condemns it as manifested by nations.

It is undoubtedly harder for a country under popular government to pursue a consistent course, than for an individual monarch or despot.

The monarch may pursue his own consistent course of generosity or tyranny to the end. A people is more easily swayed by the voices of orators, or exalted to overbearing pride or chastened to humility by the vicissitudes of national prosperity or adversity. Two years ago England was proud and confident. Now she is fretful. Who can doubt that a severe period of depression at home now, hard frosts, want of work, and higher price of coals, if all this should come upon us this winter, would tend to produce a strong popular feeling against the Government and the war? Twopence on the income-tax has not been without its effect, even in quarters where only a year before there were loud protests that every Englishman would gladly give his last shilling for his Queen and his country. There is a great difference between that "last shilling" which no one ever paid or will pay for a war and the first twopence which the tax-collector actually calls for.

Yet this unhappy quarrel in South Africa has not been without its example of true national greatness. The Orange Free State had no quarrel with us, nothing to gain, and possibly its very existence to lose, by a war with us. It had at one time in its history refused to join the Transvaal against us. But in 1899 this State was united with the Transvaal Republic by a defensive treaty. When war threatened the Transvaal, the Orange Free State had to decide whether it would abide by the treaty it had sworn. I believe the vote in the Raad was unanimous. I know that after the decision was made old men bid each other farewell with tears and trembling voice, well knowing that they had done right, yet saying to each other "We have met here for the last time."

We know the old scoff, "Treaties are made to be broken"; and in truth they usually last just so long as they serve the advantage of both parties, and no longer. This action on the part of the Orange Free State is alternately ridiculed as foolish and condemned as wicked. If such an act on the part of any nation be folly, surely it is what the apostle Paul dares to call "the foolishness of God, which is wiser than man"; and surely we may at least have magnanimity enough, even now, to honour the people that "sweareth to its own hurt and changeth not."

Francis H. Jones.

Of the letters in reply to Mr. Smith Osler's, of a fortnight ago, we must be content after all with giving only the following extract from that of Mr. G. F. Millin, of Brixton:—

"Mr. T. Smith Osler's letter appears to me to be a piece of very confused and misdirected thinking. There are several points in it that one might take in evidence of this, but I will deal with only one. The position in the Transvaal was, he says, as if the accidents of history had placed Liverpool and its wealth under the absolute control of a state composed of ignorant Welsh farmers. That surely is a totally hind-before, upside-down illustration. If we want to illustrate the real facts of the matter, we must suppose that the 'ignorant Welsh farmers' had settled in the country when there was no Liverpool, that they had established an orderly constitutional government, had developed the agricultural resources of the land, and had themselves built Liverpool; and that presently foreign capitalists, and others in their train, poured in upon them in such numbers as to threaten completely to swamp them. It is no case of the Welshmen coming in and getting the upper hand of the Liverpudlians, it is the Liverpudlians who come in and get the upper hand, or try to get the upper hand, of the Welshmen; and because they were wealthy, and because they were numerous, Mr. Osler seems to consider them justified in trampling down everything before them. That seems to me a deplorable error for any liberal-minded man to fall into, and it is just because this whole nation allowed itself to be cunningly inveigled into this error that we now find ourselves in a position which outrages the conscience of the country, but from which it seems as though we can neither retire nor advance without aggravating the evil of it."

FREEDOM AND THE HUMAN SELF.

Sir,—May add a word for the purpose, not of introducing fresh matter, but of removing a misconception? Mr. Badland, in his interesting letter, assigns to me the view that in volition "we have reached an ultimate fact, or one to which the law of causality itself may not apply."

We must distinguish between the law of causation—that is, that every fact which has a beginning has a cause—and causality, which is not a law or proposition of any kind, but one of the a priori categories—a necessary condition of human thinking; it involves our notion of cause (so far as we have a notion of cause) and the necessity under which we are to interpret phenomena causally.

Science is based on the universality of the law of causation. Mr. Upton's position is that it has one exception, and only one, namely, human volition, which is in each of its operations (after elimination of determinate elements), a fact which begins but has no cause.

My suggestion is that our a priori category of causality, though necessary in our thinking, is, perhaps, only provisional and human, not absolute and divine. It resembles those mathematical assumptions which are useful in mechanical calculation, as being accurate enough for practical purposes, but are not absolutely accurate. In calculation based on such an assumption the error is always present, though it is only in calculation of extreme delicacy that the error becomes appreciable. This question of the free will seems to me to be a case in which the error in our category of causality becomes appreciable.

THE LONDON & SOUTH-EASTERN PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

Sir,—Perhaps I may be allowed, as one partly responsible for the resolution recently passed appointing a committee to report to the Assembly on public questions having a distinctly religious interest and importance, to send a few lines in reply to your correspondent, Mr. Hugh James.

Mr. James tells us that there has been a good deal of "head shaking" ever since the inauguration of the Provincial Assembly. But the "head shaking" seems to come so much from one quarter; and there seems to be behind it so much of a particular political bias, that it is beginning to lose much of its significance. The bogey of a "cleavage in our ranks" and the "loss of valued friends and supporters, together with income," is all very well; but it is an argument which cuts both ways. And, in the opinion of many of us, we shall do more harm to our cause and our congregations by a timid refusal to apply our religion to great national and humanitarian issues, and by the maintenance of an ignoble silence in presence of solemn problems of life and death which concern whole peoples, than we can possibly do by a candid and temperate discussion of these questions in the light of our religion, and the pronouncement of a verdict by the predominant conscience of our people. Mr. James raises, as others have done before him, the old difficulty of "delegacy" and "special instructions," a point, I think, more legalistic than vital.

May I ask him and those who think with him to try to put themselves in the places of those Liberals (in religion and politics) who, in my belief, form the large majority of worshippers in our churches. Their religion and their politics (so far as humanitarian and ethical considerations are concerned) are not two water-tight compartments of their brain and heart, but one single passion, one aspiration, one attitude of thought and feeling. To me it is just as much a religious duty to oppose the policy of proscription and extermination in South Africa as it is to oppose low ideas of the Godhead, and the lack of veracity in theological subscription.

And then, leaving this particular class of public topics aside, is it not one of the noblest and best traditions of our churches to keep a watchful eye upon the education of the young in public schools, the ravages of a privileged Drink Traffic, and the condition of the Poor and enslaved in our great cities? Will Mr. James forbid us also to speak of these at our public assemblies?

If it is simply desired to have a separate time and place for our people to pronounce judgment on these topics—well and good. That is a mere question of machinery. But I venture to think that the conscience of our churches is of too robust a type to allow its voice to be stifled at times when the voice of worldliness, greed and passion is all too loud, and there is such dire need for a message in God's name from professing Christians, and the application of their "fundamental truths" to pressing modern instances, and immediate actual needs. The new Committee of the Conference was appointed to report. On their report discussion will, perhaps, ensue. But I think its members may be trusted to remember the differences which exist, and to do their work in a temperate manner. If, then, there are to be dissensions, they must be faced. The one thing that is impossible is a religion divorced from practical ethics, and whose eyes are in the past and not upon the sins, the needs, the aspirations of men to-day.

H. S. Perris.

London, Nov. 11.

Sir,—In last week's Inquirer, under the heading of "The London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly," Mr. James suggests that the discussion of public questions in our churches will constitute for them a very serious danger. May I send to you a few sentences from a sermon preached in 1880 by that noble-hearted apostle of liberal religious thought, the Rev. Henry Crosskey, at the opening of the church in Rotherham—that we may thus gather the course which he would have been likely to adopt had he been with us to-day? Dr. Crosskey says:—"The sins which must here (i.e., in this church) be rebuked are the very devilries practised in our own day and generation . . . the mean and grovelling worship of success, however gained; the lust for war, which makes Europe at this moment one vast camp, with unimaginable possibilities of desolation and slaughter standing as awful phantoms in the path of its near future." "Preach we the Christ who never feared a heresy, though men shrieked at him in their rage, and declared that he was a blasphemer."

In the Church of England men like Dean Kitchin and Canon Hicks have not hesitated to declare their opinions, and to bear the odium resulting therefrom. Some of our own household of faith have also, we rejoice to think, scorned consequences, and delivered their message. All honour to them!

If we turn to history (which has a wonderful way of repeating itself), and survey the great struggle in America to secure the freedom of the slaves, we shall see that a similar plea to that urged upon us to-day was then brought forward—namely, that this was not a question to be taken up by the churches! Yet whose is the name which will be honoured to the end of time? Is it not that of a Theodore Parker, who, in spite of consequences to himself and to his Church membership, espoused the cause of the slave?

We must recognise the fact that possibilities of cleavage will, from time to time, arise in our churches, as in all other associations; yet, surely, such possibilities must not be allowed to form an excuse for the adoption of an ignoble policy of expediency in a great national crisis. Our churches are for the preaching and practice of righteousness between man and man, nation and nation, or they exist in vain. With the results of such preaching they must not be unduly concerned: these lie elsewhere. England to-day sorely needs the outspoken and faithful guidance of the Christian Church; may it not be weighed in the balance and found wanting! Alice A. Lucas.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Bertin's Wooden Horse.

Bertin Hamon was ten years old one summer day, and his father, who was a fisherman, promised to take him out in his white boat, which was to sail round the island with an English gentleman. The name of the island was Sark, and everybody knows that it is one of the Channel Isles. Bertin's mother gave him a wooden horse, with a smart red saddle, for a birthday present; and when the boy was just starting off with his father, his little brother Pierre asked if he might play with the beautiful horse, just for a short time, and he would take oh, such care of it! Now Bertin had no other toys, for his people were too poor to buy them; it was just by chance that his mother had been able to get this one cheap in Guernsey, with two shillings that she had earned by knitting. So, you see, it was a very great joy to have this horse that went on wheels all across the floor of the kitchen, and Bertin could not make up his mind to let Pierre play with it while he was away.

"No, no!" he cried in Sark French, "I can't lend it; you'll be sure to break it!"

Pierre coaxed, and tears came into his big eyes; but it was no use. Bertin ran off after his father down the hill with ferny cliffs on each side, and through a tunnel cut into a great rock and out into a tiny harbour full of deliciously cool, green water where father's white boat rocked up and down, for it was longing to be off. Such a sail as Bertin had over the dancing sea with a jolly breeze sending the boat on like a galloping horse! Mr. Starling, the English gentleman, fished with a line for mackerel, and so did the boy, till between them they got a fine catch before it was time to go home. Bertin was happier than a king, and ate his lunch and chatted, and told Mr. Starling of his horse; and never once did he feel sorry for poor tiny Pierre alone in the cottage on the cliff. When they landed in the evening at the harbour, Mr. Starling took Bertin to his lodgings to get some clothes belonging to his own rich little boy, that he said would fit Bertin. He took the child straight into a sitting-room, where a kind lady spoke sweetly to him, and where Mr. Starling's boy Jack was playing with toys—a train, horses, cows, soldiers, drums, and lots of other things. When Mrs. Starling heard it was Bertin's birthday she gave him an English penny, and she asked Jack if he would not like to give Bertin one of his toys. But Master Jack frowned and shrugged his shoulders, and looked as cross as two sticks. "I don't want his things!" cried Bertin, getting red, and taking up the bundle of clothes Mrs. Starling gave him.

"He is a selfish boy," said the pretty mother, "but if he does not give with a good heart I won't force him. Only he'll not have another toy from me till he has learnt to be generous." She said this to Mr. Starling, but Bertin heard as he hurried away, angry and hurt. When he opened the cottage door he saw Pierre on the green bed by the wide hearth, where a fire of dried seaweed burned, and on a chair near was the wooden horse, covered with a clean towel.

"I haven't touched him!" cried Pierre, "only just looked and stared at him, Bertin! But he is so beautiful that I was afraid I might kiss him, so mother put a towel over him to hide him till you came back."

Bertin threw down his bundle, pulled off the towel, and carried the horse to Pierre.

"He's going to be half yours," he cried, with shining eyes, "play with him now."

Pierre gasped for joy as he stooped and kissed the grand horse, and the mother said a little prayer of gladness when Bertin told her that he did not want to be selfish and keep the horse to himself. And as she tucked him up that night and the sweet sound of the waves came in through the tiny latticed window he told her of Jack Starling.

"Mon chéri," she said, "you see it makes no difference whether we have a lot of toys or only one. If we are kind and lend them that is a little like the Great Good God who gives us all we have. Never forget that, my boy, and when you are a man like father you will love to help and be kind, just as he does and as Mr. Starling does."

And Bertin turned and rubbed his brown cheek against Pierre's curly head, and he was glad with a lovely giving joy.

In last week's Children's Column, which told of the "Clipping of the Church," that curious word was explained as meaning the calling of the church by its name, and so celebrating its birthday, when its name was given, connecting it with the old English word yclept, called. But more than one friend has written to say that this is probably a mistake, and that "clipping" is another old English word, which means "embracing," so that we should then have to think of the children taking hands round their church, and so embracing it in their loyal affection.

OUR PRESENT SERVICE.

IN the paper on "The Minister's Adjustment to the New Conditions," read by the Rev. WILLIAM C. GANNETT at the recent meeting of the American National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, from which we quoted last week, it was laid down as a first principle that now as always it is the minister's duty to interpret Nature and Life in their spiritual aspects, and to inspire men to live the life of the spirit. And in this new era, when the revelations of science have opened to us a vaster and more wonderful and glorious universe, and the profounder study of history and human nature has revealed to us a truer unity of man and universality of religious life, it is, Mr. GANNETT said, the minister's task to declare a nobler theology, translated out of Nature (and particularly, we should say, out of Human Nature) and to interpret afresh the indwelling GOD of the soul. And to these two—a grander theology, a deeper psychology—he adds one other enrichment, "an ampler and truer sociology," as a third and perhaps the most significant phase of the new dispensation of our modern time.

The rise of democracy, the new economics, the widening reforms and philanthropies, the exaltation of woman, the gathering strength of the unions of labour, the new "socialism" in which we all share more or less ; in religion the change in the aim of salvation from personal to social, and in the sphere of salvation from heaven to the earth, and in the plan of salvation from methods that would fain save the soul to methods that endeavour to save the whole man—body, mind, heart, and soul—such signs as these (and their number is legion) attest that the prayer of our lips, "Thy kingdom come," is getting down to our hearts and through to our hands, and that the sociological dream of Jesus is at last on its way to come true.

It is a sign of the changed attitude towards questions of social order as belonging directly to the kingdom of GOD and His righteousness, that whereas a generation ago no college for the training of ministers recognised Social Economics as a necessary subject, now a growing importance is attached both to such theoretical studies and to the practical training of men by contact with the realities of life in social settlements or in some form of mission work in great cities. We ask sometimes how we are to gain new power to declare the Gospel of the FATHER'S love, and to reach the people who show such stolid indifference to all the ministrations of religion ; and the answer is, by realising with a new intensity the presence amid the affairs of this world of a living GOD, whose love touches the things of our daily duty, not in the hour of secluded worship only, but in the street, in the turmoil of the world where every unlovely thing jostles with truth and purity and honour and loving-kindness. If the Gospel is to be declared to-day, and the tongues and the hearts of men are once more to be on fire to redeem the world, it must be because the kingdom of GOD is the most real thing with which we have to deal, here in our midst, commanding a passionate allegiance, and through the self-sacrifice of faithful men and women making its way to victory over every evil thing.

This was the burden also of Dr. EDWARD EVERETT HALE'S "Retrospect and Prospect" at the Conference.

To any given church, as a Christian organisation, the injunction is not that you shall have a decorous Sunday service at half-past ten, and in the evening a music service or a forward movement for an hour and three-quarters, and forget the rest of the time that you are a church, but that for the only object of the existence of that church you shall have the coming in of the Kingdom of God standing evident before all eyes. . . . This means that the religious business of the next century is for all men and all women, not for the clergy or the sextons or the monks or any other professionals. This Conference must make the plough-boy in Dakota, the engine-driver in the valley of the Mohawk, the look-out on the steamer's deck, and the bootblack in the streets of New York—it must make them all understand that they are all in God's work, and that He needs them to-day. For once the work of the State and the Church is the same ; the work of the layman and the priest is the same ; the work of the men and women is the same. The order of the day is for what they call in the German army the rising of the Landsturm, which means the rising of the people.

To everyone the same call has come, and there is no other way of salvation : to seek first the Kingdom of GOD and His righteousness, not in pious aspiration on the Sunday only, but every day and in every place, in the heart of every citizen, and in the concord of the nations, in a veritable brotherhood of Man.

Of this appeal, and how it may be worked out in actual life, we will add here one striking example from the paper on "The Church and the Social Problem," by Miss JANE ADDAMS, of the Hull House Social Settlement in Chicago. Miss ADDAMS having described the character of the work originated by Canon BARNETT, at Toynbee Hall, and taken up by others both in this country and America, shows how much scope they have found for the ministrations of human sympathy in the great Italian and Russian colonies in Chicago, and what inestimable good may be done, in bringing members of different classes and different nationalities to mutual and friendly understanding. We need not add any further word to point the moral, but simply print here the concluding passages of Miss ADDAMS'S paper.

THE HULL HOUSE SOCIAL SETTLEMENT IN CHICAGO.

The settlement claims as one of its methods that it does throw its fortunes in with the fortunes of the men of its own community ; that it does give tangible expression to the social needs of a great many people ; that day after day, week after week, and year after year, it tries to know various phases of the social problem. It offers one common centre where people of various sorts may meet and exchange views, where they may serve, not only each other, but the common purposes of the neighbourhood and the common purposes of the city. Then, if one or the other is misunderstood, if the capitalist—poor man, he gets his share of abuse—is misunderstood, it is quite possible that the working-man who may have met him at the settlement may be able to stand up for him in the trades-union meeting. If the trades-union man is misunderstood—and, surely, he has had a hard time lately—some scholar or citizen of repute, who has seen him and known him, may be able to interpret him, not under the name of a class, not one out of a mass of men, but as man to man.

The settlements break up the members of a class into little groups. The worst thing that can happen to an anarchist, for instance, is to feel that all law and government are against him, for him to meet only a few men who are as bitter as he is himself. The way to keep him is to scatter him among sane and normal people, so that he shall see different aspects of life and meet people who are not embittered.

I have been asked to say something about the Hull House Woman's Club ; and, as it is a successful example of what the settlement is trying to do, it may be well to close with that. Two hundred and fifty women of the vicinity in which Hull House is situated are members of this club. It has been organised for years. They take pains to find out what they, as a club, can do, to be of service to that part of the city. They have decorated one of the public schools in the neighbourhood, kalsomining the walls and hanging upon them really beautiful pictures. They have established a Mothers' Club in one school, for which they regularly provide speakers, refreshment, and general social good cheer. One summer, when the ward was badly cleaned, they divided it into sections; and each one of the women went up and down the alleys, inspecting them, so that they sent in to the board of health in one month a thousand reports and complaints. Two inspectors were removed; and one member of the club, resident of Hull House, became the garbage inspector for that neighbourhood. These women broke out in loud applause when they learned that, as a consequence of the efforts of this inspector and of their co-operation, the death-rate had been reduced and was steadily being lowered. They have a Social Extension Committee. They invite to an occasional evening the people in the neighbourhood who, they think, are not having the sort of social life they would like to have, people who are sad, people who do not speak English, people who cannot take hold of any formulated social life. It is not easy to do this. The Irish-American woman who can talk English perfectly well, when she invites the Italian woman, crosses a gulf—as much of a social gulf as one can find anywhere. Of course, the idea that the social gulf is one big gulf is absurb. But she wades through her little gulf, and asks her Italian neighbour to come to the gathering because she is public-spirited and because she believes that, if social life is good for her, it should be extended to the Italian woman as well.

I recall one winter evening long ago when the Italian women did not come, but sent their husbands instead, for reasons best known to themselves. Perhaps they were afraid of being socially extended. It was not easy for the club to entertain a roomful of heavy Italian labourers; but they had refreshments, which every one could understand. One of the Italians did a number of pretty tricks, such as one sees in the streets of Naples. Another sang rousing songs. And the evening went happily. At the close one of the women of the club said to me:—"I am ashamed of the way I used to talk about Dagoes. I used to say that we must move off the street because there were so many Dagoes coming in. But they are just like other people, only you have to take more pains to find them out."

That was the result of cultivation, if we take the definition that it is extended experience. It is exactly the thing we send our children to Europe for, the result we hope for when we read books about all kinds of people—to get over the differences raised by language and national barriers and traditions, that really we may be fair-minded and may know people as they really are. And, if we can do that in one's social life as in one's intellectual life, or if we are without much intellectual life and can do it in our social life, it is a great achievement.

A distinct impression can be made upon a neighbourhood when you can get a group of some hundreds of people, with this object in view, to work together for the common good. We have between three and four thousand people coming weekly to Hull House. Say one-third or one-fourth have the desire to extend the social relation, an interest in pulling all together to make things in the neighbourhood better: you get a mass of warmth and kindliness out of the neighbourhood itself which transforms and changes many things which were harsh before. That, too, is a settlement method. It is the church's method, save that the church is not in contact with the mass of working-people. It has quite withdrawn from the mass of people who work with their hands. If it were to go back to the method of personal acquaintance with working-people, not with any ulterior object of trying to make men believe or disbelieve this or that, it would be the same method. If you have a democratic aim, you must have a democratic method. Or you love the democracy of one because of the exclusiveness of the other.

People who live as friends and neighbours constantly find things which are alike in each other, and that those things are stronger than the things which make us different. They gradually forgot the latter, and remember more and more those things which make us alike. That is what is meant when Charles Lamb says you cannot hate a man after you know him; and, if you do not know him, it is your own fault.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE autumn meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, Nov. 13, and was very largely attended by members and friends, who were received by Mr. David Martineau, the President, and Mrs. Martineau, the first part of the evening being devoted to sociability.

PRESENTATION TO MR. DAVID MARTINEAU.

Before the stated business of the meeting began the chair was taken by Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., President of the B. and F.U.A., on whose right were Mr. and Mrs. David Martineau and Mr. P. M. Martineau, while on an easel close by was the veiled portrait of Mr. David Martineau, by Mr. Arthur Hacker, A.R.A. There were also on the platform Messrs. John Harrison, President of the Provincial Assembly of London, and S.-E. Counties, H. Epps, T. H. Terry (Treasurer), and the Rev. J. E. Stronge (Secretary). Among the audience were at least two of the original members of the Society, Messrs. J. T. Preston and S. S. Tayler. Mr. Arthur Hacker was also present.

MR. ODGERS, in opening the proceedings, said it was a very sincere gratification to him to occupy that position, when they were offering to Mr. David Martineau a slight tribute of gratitude and admiration for the services he had rendered for so many years to their cause in London. It was in 1872 that Mr. Martineau was appointed Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, in succession to Sir James Clarke Lawrence, who then became President; even before that he had worked for the cause and had ever since been foremost in every undertaking. He had never lost heart or hope, looking forward confidentially and never letting an adverse balance deter him from embarking on new work. Mr. Martineau bore an honoured name and added new lustre to it in their household of faith. He had remained Treasurer until last year, when on his retirement he was elected President, and they felt that the occasion should be marked by some token of the high regard in which Mr. Martineau was held. Many friends had therefore united, and Mr. Arthur Hacker had painted an admirable portrait of their President, which he was now to have the pleasure of presenting to Mr. Martineau.

Mr. Odgers then unveiled the portrait amid great applause, and Mr. H. Epps, treasurer of the Presentation Fund, added a few words of tribute and of gratification at the happy completion of their undertaking.

MR. DAVID MARTINEAU, in acknowledging the gift, said that he could not adequately express what he felt of gratitude and obligation for that handsome present to him and his family, and for their too kind expressions with regard to the work of the past thirty years. The Treasurership of the London District Unitarian Society he had always felt to be an office of trust which it was a high honour to hold year after year, and the gratitude must be on his side for having been allowed to work for so interesting and good a cause, in however humble a way, to strengthen their churches and church life in and about London. That Society was founded more than fifty years ago, and it was a pleasure to him to welcome that night a few veterans who attended its inauguration. When they looked back to the comparatively isolated state of their free churches then, and the knowledge of each other, and the brotherly feeling with all their churches at present existing, they might well admire the work of their predecessors, the arduous and splendid work done by men like the Prestons, the Lawrences, their good friend Mr. Tayler, and others like them—they might well give thanks and take courage. He was grateful for the opportunity they had given him to follow in the steps of those men, and though he regretted that infirmities warned him now to give up some of his work, he rejoiced to see young men coming forward to take it up, and he assured them that in such work they would find their reward. For himself he did not claim to have done anything special, and did not deserve such recognition as they had given. It had been a great pleasure to him to do that work, and he should never regret the time he had spent as Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society.

"OUR DUTY TO LONDON TO-DAY."

MR. MARTINEAU then took the chair as President, and said that he was delighted to see so large an attendance of members and friends. They were to consider the great question of their duty to London to-day.

MR. JOHN HARRISON, who was the first speaker, turned first to the President with warm words of acknowledgment joining in the tribute that had just been paid.

Their duty to London as Unitarians, he said, was clearly defined. It was to make their faith known in an unmistakable manner; and that must be done first of all by the demonstration of personal interest, by punctual and regular attendance at their places of worship, making the services as bright and cheerful, as beautiful and reasonable as possible, and by giving support not only to their individual congregations but to the societies which united them all together. At present any reason seemed sufficient to keep people from attending service, dull sermons, bad music and what not; but staying away would not put more fire into the preacher or make the singing more cheerful. They neglected their first duty by such failure in attendance. There were many complaints of the indifference of their young people, and many causes for it. One cause he thought was too much attention to physical culture and sport. If young people could only be attracted to their churches through the lawn-tennis or foot-ball club he did not think they would be of much service when attracted. They must see to it that there was nothing antiquated or inconsistent in their hymn books and liturgies, so that their simple faith should be presented in the clearest and best possible way.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, having also paid his tribute to the splendid courage and optimism of Mr. Martineau as treasurer, which had been so helpful in the day of small things, spoke of the vastness of London and the difficulty of grasping all that it meant and the greatness of its needs. There they found the greatest contrasts in life, not without many difficulties and dangers. London to the thoughtful mind presented the most interesting and the most perplexing problem in the world. In face of that problem, their duty as a Unitarian Society was to offer the best thought and life and aspiration they could put into it. London required nothing so much as the infusion into its whole thought and life and activity of rational religion. No schemes of Council or Parliament would yield so much as the power of genuine religion, if only they could bring it to bear on the life of the community. The whole administration of London would only be able to do its proper work when there was deeper thought, larger aspiration thrilling through the whole body. It was only little they could do, but were they doing all they might? That Society had done splendid service, but it might do much more. It was a Unitarian society, and as to that name he did not agree with a remark in last week's Inquirer, for what their American brethren had done was not to empty that name of all meaning, but to fill it with new and broader meaning. And that was what they must do. They must make it clear that in a Unitarian church there was a home for all earnest religion and liberal aspiration, that no lover of truth, no seeker after goodness would feel a stranger, and no friend of his race need be afraid that he would not receive a cordial welcome under that banner. They must not be discouraged by failure. Their ultimate object was to found self-supporting churches, and so they would best help those districts where there could not be self-supported churches. Their Domestic Mission theory, he thought, wanted some modification. Each self-supporting church should regard it as a duty to provide the workers and money for at least one such mission. Hampstead, for instance, might undertake the whole responsibility of Mansford-street; indeed, such a congregation ought to have more than one mission church. Newington-green and Islington might undertake George's-row, and other established congregations should accept similar responsibilities. He commended to them that enthusiasm of humanity to be seen in the letters of J. R. Green, just published. Then in the twenty-eight boroughs into which London was now divided there were whole communities, with hundreds of thousands of inhabitants, where there was no Unitarian church. In the vast district covered by Chelsea, Fulham, Hammersmith, Paddington, and Westminster, they had only Essex Church. Surely they might do a great deal more. In new districts they should be watchful and secure good corner sites, as other bodies did, and put down a temporary church, and a thoroughly good minister, for an experimental three years, and if there was no sufficient result they could, without much loss, remove the church elsewhere. With more practical business foresight they would achieve far better results than in the past.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant said that in view of the vastness of London, they would be less discouraged if they did not leave out of sight other agencies working in the same direction. As regards the prosperity of their cause, their immediate duty was to see that the life of their existing churches was the fullest and most effective that it could be made. They must not pretend to carry a mission of life to others, if there were no life in themselves. It was useless to talk to others of their rational and beautiful faith, if their own young people were indifferent and the older people grew discouraged. How did they stand the test of genuine giving for the cause? What they needed was a thorough regeneration and rebaptism of the Spirit, that they might live not for the passing gratification of the hour, but for eternal issues. They must make their buildings as beautiful and gracious as possible, not a standing satire on people who love to beautify their own drawing-rooms but neglect the church, which they ought to love as their gathering place for thankgiving and aspiration. And he agreed with Mr. Harrison as to the duty of attendance. They ought to feel it as imperative for the good of the community that people should go to church as that they should go to business. No community could really thrive without religion. The ministers' duty was never to be satisfied with any standard of attainment, but to strive always to make their preaching stronger, more full of fire, more beautiful and more persuasive, going straight to the heart. They must be on fire with their message, if the people were to be set on fire. As to the missionary spirit, he pointed as an instance to Bermondsey, which it would be pitiable to leave derelict. That problem was not yet closed. At present they, as a society, had to ask the Provincial Assembly for a twelfth of that excellent man, Mr. Edwards, when when they ought rather to have twelve apostles of their own to go out to the work. Their next step, he thought, should be to appoint a missionary of their own; that would be to make a real advance in their work.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., spoke of the progress that had actually been made during the past century, and said that not only should they have a Unitarian church in every one of the twenty-eight London boroughs, he would like to see one in every square mile. There was as much need as ever for their churches; while they met liberalism in many quarters, there was still a great mass of narrow-minded bigotry and ignorance, and an even greater mass of apathy and indifference, which was the most serious obstacle in their way. He spoke with pleasure of the prosperous work at Wood Green, Kilburn, Forest Gate, and Lewisham, but urged that there was still far more they ought to do.

The Rev. J. E. Stronge recalled the objects for which that Society was founded more than fifty years ago, to strengthen the work of Unitarians in London and bring them into closer union. There was still the same need for loyalty to the cause. The truth they held had brought hope and courage to many souls, it satisfied the aspirations of their spiritual nature and harmonised with the highest knowledge of the time. What was so helpful to themselves they must share with others. They must enforce the right of private judgment, and expound to the people the truths and principles of Unitarianism. They did not hesitate to take the Unitarian name, and went forth to carry the good news to all whom they could reach. It was idle to discuss whether they could be called by any other name, but their name must not be limited to any narrow dogmatic meaning. They used it in a large and inclusive way, so as not to exclude any member of their Free Churches. He pointed out the practical difficulties in the way of such a name as "Free Catholic," which the Editor of The Inquirer had favoured. They must read their liberal principles into the Unitarian name. They had principles and beliefs to proclaim to-day, without setting any hindrance in the way of the future progress of thought. He pointed to the great districts growing up in the north of London, and urged that they must go forward and accept the responsibilities of the new work at whatever cost.

On the Chairman's inviting discussion the Revs. W. C. Pope, H. W. Perris and T. E. M. Edwards and Messrs. E. Bakewell and Ravenstein spoke, and the Chairman having briefly summed up the discussion, a vote of thanks to the chair, proposed by Mr. T. H. Terry, and carried by acclamation, brought the meeting to a close.

ITALIAN NOTES.

Vico, the Italian scholar, who died in 1744, maintained that humanity after three consecutive ages of its history, arriving at the last, returned to the first, and so revolved in a perpetual circle. I will not decide upon that doctrine, preferring to believe in the progress of our institutions and ideas. Nevertheless, there are in the world cases which seem to make in the Neapolitan professor's favour. What do we see, in fact, to-day? While in England, a Protestant country, the ritualist movement grows and appears to denote a retrogression to Catholicism, in countries greatly Catholic, such as France, Spain, Portugal and Italy, people, on the contrary, are endeavouring to shake off the yoke of Rome, at least in some of its aspects. The anti-clerical manifestations are now renewed; every day brings new instances to record.

In Italy—I will speak only on that country—the anti-clerical movement is less accentuated than in other countries, the Government standing aloof; nevertheless, things do happen, and perhaps prepare public opinion for larger action.

I take some examples. At Terni, the various popular societies have united to protest against the interference of priests in every business, and have expressed the desire that every public institution should be for the future under lay control. At Spezzia a great meeting was held in the city theatre, when strong anti-clerical speeches were made, blaming the temporal aspirations of the clergy, denouncing the conduct of the Jesuits as a degradation of Christianity, and finally asking for the suppression of Article I. of the Italian Statute: "The religion of the State is the Catholic religion" . . . &c. Such expressions do not indeed lead to practical results, but they mark the trend of public opinion. Bursts of anger, cries of indignation, calls to shake off the yoke of the priests, too often come to nothing in Italy, where people are as quickly pacified as they are roused to enthusiasm.

In that respect Leghorn has shown a better front and has struck while the iron was hot. It did not, in reality, attack principles, with a definite purpose of reform, it was rather an expression of strong dissatisfaction with its bishop, Mgr. Giani. He, at the last Catholic Congress, held at Taranto, in September, compromised himself by the most intolerant declarations in comtempt of national institutions, at which patriots were scandalised. The Leghorners, not having obtained from the Government the dismissal of their bishop, decided by a vote of the Town Council, to mark their indignation by changing the names of three streets dear to clericals; and at the same time voted a credit of 200 lire to erect a monument to Giordano Bruno. The three streets are Via della Madonna (Virgin Mary-street), St. Francis-street, and (ecclesiastical) Seminary-street, which are now Giordano Bruno's-street, Galileo's-street, Arnaldo of Brescia's-street! A philosopher burned alive by the Inquisition, a scholar persecuted by the Church, a precursor of the Italian reform—that ought to disturb Mgr. Giani's and his friends' rest!

I said that these small anti-clerical manifestations perhaps prepare public opinion for larger action, which then would come from the Government. It is seriously in question to propose in Parliament a law of divorce. At present, Italy is, with Spain, one of the few countries where marriage is indissoluble, whatever might be the reasons to the contrary. Of course, it is the Roman Church which has opposed, till now, every modification of this law; but the present ministry seems disposed not to listen to the voice of the Vatican. Let us hope it, though we are warned to remember the fable of La Fontaine, who said one should not sell the bear's skin before the bear was killed.

PROTESTANISM IN FRANCE.

SIR,—You did well to direct the attention of your readers to Mr. Heath's article in the last Contemporary Review on the above subject, which I for one found to be of considerable historic interest. But the writer seems scarcely to have brought his information up to date. The statistics given to show numerical decline in the Protestant Churches relate to the year 1890, as compared with 1835. But for the last year or more the well-known French daily paper, La Siècle, has had frequently recurring articles under the heading "Rompons avec Rome," from which it would appear that Protestantism is advancing by leaps and bounds in some half-dozen departments of the South West, in Auvergne, and, strangest of all, in Brittany; not so much owing to proselytising enterprise on the part of the Protestant pastors as to spontaneous invitations from Catholic congregations, revolting en masse from their curés for one reason or another. The correspondent of the Siècle does not, unfortunately, throw much light on the kind of Gospel with which these new converts are fed; but it cannot fail to be a change from worse to better.

Very significant also is the advice given by the editor, himself evidently a reverent agnostic of the Huxley type, that those who think as he does should, for the sake of their children, join the most liberal Protestant Church within their reach, instead of allowing themselves to be counted as nominal Catholics and leaving their children to be taken by the mother to mass and confessional.

Perhaps the French friends who addressed us in May last may be able to tell us something more about this new movement.

THE MANCHESTER LETTER: A CORRECTION.

SIR,—I fear it is rather late to draw attention to what seems to me an error in the Rev. C. Roper's letter of Oct. 26, in which the writer, in spite of the qualifying word "probably," gives the impression that there are only two unsectarian missions in Manchester—namely, those in Willert-street and Renshaw-street.

Mr. Roper overlooks the existence of the Manchester City Mission with its nearly 100 missionaries going from house to house in the most unsectarian fashion, not working in the interests of any particular sect.

We may not like the "orthodoxy" or the methods of these men, but as disciples of the Master we are bound to recognise the Master's spirit which shines out in their "love of souls" in their desire to redeem men from vice and sin and to lead them to God, and this, too, without any ulterior motive of attaching them to any sectarian fold.

Within fifty yards from Willert-street there exists one of the many stations of the City Mission, and I was always proud to look upon it and the devout man who carried it on as equally unsectarian as the Willert-street Mission.

Again, perhaps Mr. Roper is not aware that I also have the honour of still being among those who minister to the poor, that my centre of work is in Goulden-street (No. 2), and that although on account of an insanitary small room I cannot boast of much winter evening class work, yet, perhaps, I am better employed in sitting at the cottage fire-side, comforting the aged, infirm, and those who have but few friends, and that I am, in my own unconventional way, as actively engaged in going about doing good as I ever was in the happy old inspiring days in Willert-street.

Therefore, in justice to those who not only are supporters of almost every good work amongst us, and whose names are held in high repute wherever the members of our faith meet to worship God, but who, nevertheless, most gladly are finding the means to enable me to carry on a truly unsectarian mission in the very worst district of this great city—surely, there are more than two unsectarian missions in the city of Manchester!

THE "CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE."

SIR,—The attention of the Committee of the General Baptist Assembly has been directed to a statement quoted in your notice of the third supplemental volume of "The Dictionary of National Biography," wherein it appears that the "Christian Conference" was founded on the initiative of the late Rev. Robert Spears.

I have been requested to ask your kind permission to make the following explanation of its origin.

It arose out of a Conference held under the auspices of the General Baptist Assembly at their annual gathering in 1881, held on that occasion at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, London. A Paper was read by the Rev. W. Harvey Smith, followed by discussion. Among those present and taking part in the proceedings were the Revs. Canon Freemantle, Canon Barnett, Professor Drummond, Henry Solly and Robert Spears. At the conclusion of the Conference, and before the speakers had vacated the platform, a spontaneous desire was expressed by some of them that a Conference should be held annually under a more definite form, and with that object a meeting was subsequently convened at the residence of Canon Freemantle.

If one man can claim the honour of the initiation of the "Christian Conference," it is the venerable Rev. Henry Solly, at whose suggestion the gathering at the Memorial Hall was arranged.

"ASSOCIATION SUNDAY."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow us to call the attention of ministers and congregations to the collections on behalf of the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which will be taken on Sunday, Nov. 17, in a great many chapels up and down the country? Last year nearly two hundred congregations had collections, and we trust the number may, if possible, be increased this year. There is plenty of missionary work to be done, and the Association is prepared to do it if larger resources were placed at its disposal. If any of your readers should be prevented from attending their places of worship, the ministers will, no doubt, be willing to receive contributions and to add them to the sum collected at the Sunday services. Unitarians unconnected with any chapel can send their donations direct to Essex Hall.

THE HALSTEAD CONGREGATION.

SIR,—May I point out that our good friend, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, in his kindly reference to this congregation, has rather understated the facts.

I am told that the attendance now is seldom below fifty, and that on one occasion during the present autumn 170 were present, and as the room was quite full, others stood outside the door. Last Sunday evening, when I had the privilege of conducting the service, there were sixty-five adults present, and that was quite an ordinary occasion.

Let me further say that it would be very helpful to our friends there, and to those occasional visitors in whose minds the spirit of inquiry has been aroused, if a small library of Unitarian literature could be provided. W. H. SHRUBSOLE.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THERE are a great many people who are sincerely attached to the church or chapel where they worship, and who willingly do all in their power towards the support of it, who yet are almost indifferent to the cause which it represents, and to the interests of the larger church of which it is a member.

It is so in all religious associations; but the number of such people is, of course, larger when each congregation is independent, and the ties attaching one to another are of the loosest. Among us the consciousness of kinship with other congregations than our own is of the slightest. Many attend a certain place of worship because they have always done so, or because they like the minister, or the service, or because all their friends go there. Not one of these reasons of preference avails anything as respects a neighbouring town where the same doctrine is preached and the same principles upheld. So there is little or no sympathy felt towards such neighbours in their struggles or misfortunes, and there is still less sense of corporate unity—that we are, each congregation of us, members of a larger body composed of many congregations. The One Holy Universal Church is the body to which all worshippers of God and workers for righteousness throughout the world belong. But that Church has many members, and each member again has many subordinate parts; and it is only by connection with the smaller part to which each individual and each congregation belongs that connection with the main body is preserved. If the little finger says, "I am not going to belong to the hand, I belong to the whole man," and acts accordingly, severing itself from the hand, will it not also sever itself from the body? So, speaking for myself, because I claim to be a Catholic, because I love and honour and hold as my brethren all men of every religion who "seek the Lord if haply they might feel after him and find him," therefore, do I the more hold to the community of a few straggling Unitarian congregations of Yorkshire to which is my immediate and closest relation.

I may say, for myself, without boasting—indeed if disposed to boast, I should lack the whereof, I can show no results of my efforts—that ever since my settlement in Yorkshire I have done all in my power to bring our five-and-twenty churches together into one community, the richer cheerfully giving all the help needful, and the poorer anxious rather to be of service than to receive alms. The West Riding Unitarian Mission Society has become the Yorkshire Unitarian Union: if the facts had changed with the name the improvement would be great; but Whitby and Scarborough are no nearer to Leeds and Bradford because they are in the same Union, and the difficulty of distance will always keep us far apart, not only in space, but in active fellowship.

I have been led to these remarks by way of introducing to the notice of readers of THE INQUIRER a small and unpretentious quarterly, the first issue of which appeared last month, and is entitled "Forward: A quarterly Record of the Life and Work of the Churches of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union." It is published at the expense of the Union, and copies are supplied free to the churches, who are each asked to contribute, according to their means, sums varying from three guineas to five shillings. The first number consists of twenty-four pages, beginning with a letter from the editors, Mr. Ellis and Mr. Harvey-Cook, who have given much time and trouble to the unremunerative task entrusted to them. Then follow notices of societies with which we all are or ought to be connected: the B. and F. autumnal meetings, the Guilds' Union, the Yorkshire Unitarian Union and Sunday School Union, the National Unitarian Temperance Association. "The Chronicle of the Churches" follows, and each church contributes—or in two or three instances fail to contribute—an account of doings and purposes. "The first number," say the editors, "is necessarily experimental," and it may be that with a year's experience we shall find a better way. The thoughts of many of us have turned towards the Seed Sower, whose outer covers might perhaps supply our requirements in Yorkshire. But it is not so much a monthly calendar as a record and means of confidential communication we require. We want to know what our friends are doing or trying, that we may be helped by their experiences and encouraged by their successes, and feel that we being many and isolated "are one body."

Such encouragement I for one need as much as any man; and when I hear of a neighbouring church doing well I am cheered and warmed at heart by the news; when I have evidence before me that life and hope still abide in even weakest spots, I return home strengthened and refreshed. And, indeed, we have less cause for lamentation in Yorkshire just now than we have often had. All our churches are supplied with ministers, at least for the time being. Dewsbury is really promising well under the earnest and tactful care of Mr. Whiteman: he has gathered round him a few devoted workers who through good and evil have always been faithful, and we now cherish good hope of a happy issue out of late distresses. At Pudsey the new pastor, Mr. Davies, has brought orthodox enthusiasm to the help of the unorthodox cause, and has involved himself, quite unintentionally, in a public controversy which can be productive only of good. The chapel has been greatly improved, and new schoolrooms added which will be opened by Mr. John Ward, of Leeds, next Saturday. Scarborough has welcomed Mr. Binns as its new minister with something like enthusiasm; the chair at the welcome meeting was taken by Mr. William Cliff, of Leeds, and it was remarked that all those on the platform—chairman, secretary and speakers—were converts to the Unitarian cause. From Malton, a small country town, great things can never be expected, but Mr. Rodger Smyth who has lately settled there is doing as much as can be done to maintain the cause of free religion in the midst of a hostile or indifferent people. The audience which was gathered for a lecture I gave on occasion of the Harvest Festival was the best and most promising I have ever seen in the old chapel—excepting of course on occasions which brought Unitarians together there from all parts of Yorkshire.

Hull has for a time the advantage of Mr. Freckelton's ministry, and we hope his great gifts of speech, as ready as it is thoughtful, will bring together a congregation, which is, perhaps, somewhat estrayed in the absence of a shepherd.

The autumnal meetings of the Association at Leeds were everything that could be desired, except that, perhaps, some of us are inclined to regret that we were not a little more ambitious. We might certainly have gathered a larger company, and sent invitations out more freely. The truth is we were deterred rather by considerations of time than means. We could have found hospitality for many more, but we could not afford one single more opportunity for a speaker. As it was the few minutes allowed to each were strictly limited, and while we all regretted to see such a man as Mr. Freckelton brought to an abrupt pause when he had but just begun what promised to be a most able and profound contribution to our discussion, the step was forced upon a reluctant chairman by the absolute necessity of making ends meet—of beginning the next meeting at the hour arranged for it, and leaving time after it to get ready for the evening conversazione. So far as I know this was the only untoward incident at all the meetings. It is satisfactory to myself to begin a new quarter-century here under such happy omens.

Leeds, Nov. 7.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ainsworth.—An interesting event took place in the village last Monday night, when the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, minister to the Unitarian congregation, lectured, by invitation, to the Methodists, in the New Connection School, on "Robert Burns." The meeting was attended by members of the Church of England, Methodists, and Unitarians. The vote of thanks to the lecturer was proposed by a Methodist, and seconded by the vicar.

Astley.—In addition to the usual services, the lantern services are being continued this year, and were commenced on Sunday, Oct. 13. So far the attendances have been better than in former years. Last Sunday the chapel was crowded, many being present belonging to other denominations, and a fair number of persons not in the habit of attending places of worship. Special hymns and solos are sung by members of the choir.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The congregation of the South Shore Unitarian Church has bought a plot of land in a very good position on Lytham-road South, as a site for a place of worship and Sunday-school. They have been enabled to take this step through the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere; and Mr. Robert T. Heape, of Rochdale, these friends of the church having contributed £500 to the land and building fund. The congregation is so much encouraged by the increase in its numbers and the hearty co-operation of all oncerned that they hope to begin building operations at a not very distant date.

Bradford.—Channing Hall was crowded on Monday, Nov. 11, to hear the first of two lectures on his recent tour in Italy, which Mr. Ferdinand Heilborn has undertaken to deliver this session before the members of the Chapel Lane Chapel Literary Society. In an interesting and realistic manner the lecturer described his visit to Monte Carlo and other places, ending with his impressions of Rome. The lecture was illustrated with a fine selection of specially-prepared lantern slides. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer, and a musical programme followed. The chair was occupied by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones (President of the Society).

Chorley.—The Rev. A. Doel has recommenced his open lectures after a considerable personal distribution of a card bearing a list of subjects, and the following invitation:—"Dear friend,—I approach you as brother-man with the message of a Free Christian Gospel. My purpose is not proselytising, but to help you to think for yourself on the great questions of God, the Soul, Religion, Life and Duty. Come and hear for yourself what we believe and preach."

Clifton.—A newly-built Church Parlour and Lecture Hall, capable of seating 120, generously provided for the growing needs of Oakfield-road Church, by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Thomas, was successfully inaugurated by a Christmas Sale of Work, held on Nov. 12. After the National Anthem had been sung by all present, the minister (the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, M.A.), in a brief introductory address, expressed the indebtedness of the church to the munificence of their old and valued friends, to whom they owed these handsome and commodious premises, in which they might see the outward and visible sign of the reviving fortunes and the thoroughly healthy and hopeful spirit animating the congregation. Miss Gertrude Thomas (who was presented with a beautiful bouquet on behalf of the Junior Working Party by its youngest member, Miss Mollie Hartland), in opening the sale, referred in a few happily-chosen sentences to the energy and enthusiasm of the band of willing workers who gathered around Mrs. Warschauer, and to the increasing number of societies and week-day agencies which had of late years sprung up in connection with Oakfield-road Church, and which rendered such additional accommodation as was now provided a necessity. The afternoon's and evening's proceedings, which included a vocal and instrumental concert, were completely successful, both on the social and financial side, the sale realising over £60, after deducting all expenses; and Mrs. Warschauer, the organiser of the latter undertaking, was the recipient of a tangible acknowledgment, on the part of the workers, of their appreciation of her efforts.

Crewe.—On Sunday, Nov. 3, the annual sermons were preached by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Liverpool. On the following Wednesday the annual congregational tea-party was held, when upwards of 120 sat down to tea, including his Worship the Mayor, Dr. Wilson, who presided at the evening meeting, and Alderman McNeil, C.C., the Mayor-elect (Primitive Methodist). After tea there was an interesting musical programme. Mr. James Delves, the organist, presided at the piano, and addresses were given by the Chairman, the Rev. E. A. Maley, Alderman McNeill, Alderman Briggs, and the minister. The meeting was considered helpful, and was more numerously attended than in previous years.

Dundee.—The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter preached twice in the Unitarian Christian Church on Sunday, Nov. 3, in the evening, taking as his subject "Three Recent Lives of Christ." A good report appeared in the Dundee Advertiser.

Exeter.—A guild—the object of which is "to promote the study and practice of religion"—has recently been formed in connection with George's Chapel. The first regular meeting took place on Monday week, when a most interesting paper was read by Miss Davey, on the "Religion of the Ancient Greeks," which was followed by discussion and by the reading of passages from Pindar, Plato, &c., illustrative of Greek religions and usages.

Gateacre.—The first of a series of social meetings was held on Wednesday, Nov. 6, when a numerous audience came together to hear a dramatic recital by Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester. The programme included items from Shakespeare, Dickens, Jerome, and others. In serious and humorous selections alike, Mr. Harwood showed himself a master of elocutionary art, and kept the delighted attention of his hearers for close on two hours.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.—The new meeting-room has been well used since its opening in September. In addition to social meetings, lantern lectures have been given by the Rev. W. J. Jupp on his Palestine journey, and by the Rev. H. D. Roberts on "The Maoris and Hot Lakes of New Zealand." An Ancient Chapel Guild has been established, with a considerable membership, its objects being formulated as follows:—"I resolve to abstain from all intoxicating drink taken as a beverage, and to do what I can to promote temperance in all things, both in my own life and in the life of others. And I resolve not to injure or give pain to any living creature needlessly, and not willingly to destroy any beautiful thing, but to cherish kindness, gentleness and peace in all possible and reasonable ways. And as a member of the Ancient Chapel Guild I will strive to do my part to make its fellowship strong and its work useful, and I promise faithfully to keep its laws."

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held on Thursday, the 7th inst., in the Ancient Chapel schoolroom, when the Rev. J. Morley Mills (Bootle) read a most helpful paper on "Doctrinal Teaching in our Sunday Schools." The President, the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, was in the chair, and said that Mr. Mills had been asked by the Council to give a paper on this subject, in order that he might tell the Society about the Children's Faith-cards, in use at Bootle, which he had mentioned at a previous meeting. Mr. Hirst then gave a word of welcome to the Rev. A. E. Parry (Liscard) and the Rev. E. W. Lummis (Warrington), both newcomers to the neighbourhood since the Society last met. He also gave a welcome to the Southport Sunday-school, which had just affiliated itself to the Society. Mr. Morley Mills described his experiences as a teacher in Sunday schools, both Unitarian and otherwise, and said he had always felt the lack of method in the religious instruction given, if given at all. He felt very strongly that we ought to give our scholars the very best that we know, and the highest that we feel, and to him Unitarianism was the best, the truest and most helpful religion. And when he came to Bootle, after consulting with his teachers, he introduced the Faith-cards, which are given to each scholar. These cards consist of the attendance register for each child, and nine short sentences expressing what is aimed at in the religious instruction given, the first being, "I am taught that God is my heavenly Father; that He created me, cares for me, and loves me as His child"; and another, "I am taught that I cannot be good or happy alone, but only as I try to make others happy and good." The teachers were left perfectly free to make use of these or not in the course of their lesson; but Mr. Mills talks to the children once a month about them, and they are encouraged to find texts bearing upon the different subjects, and so helping to keep them in mind. A very interesting discussion followed. Miss F. Melly said she entirely disagreed with Mr. Mills's paper; she advocated definite spiritual teaching, but not definite doctrinal teaching; she thought each one ought to teach just what they believed and not what others believed, and that we ought not to set out to teach creeds. The Rev. E. W. Lummis said that we did not wish to impose creeds on anyone, and that if we are to bring these ideas to the children, what harm could there be in bringing method into the way of doing it. Miss O. M. Rawlins, the Rev. A. E. Parry, the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, Mr. Rudkin, and Mr. F. Robinson also took part in the discussion. A resolution of thanks to the Rev. J. Morley Mills brought the meeting, which was very well attended, to a close. The Council are arranging for a special meeting of the Society on Saturday, Dec. 14, to meet Professor J. Estlin Carpenter.

London: Forest Gate.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., preached in the evening to a full congregation. His subject was "Free-Thinking," a timely one, skilfully and ably handled. The Congregational Glee Union sang an anthem. The Upton-lane Church has now gathered in nearly all known residents of Unitarian antecedents, and a good many new adherents beside. When the unfinished and poorly-furnished building is properly equipped, the movement will have a bright future before it. On Thursday week the second lecture, arranged by the Literary and Social Union, was delivered by Miss Lucy Chater, on "Florence and her Associations," illustrated by a splendid series of lime-light views. On Monday evening a concert and variety entertainment was given, organised by Mr. and Mrs. Fossey and friends for the benefit of the church funds. On Thursday, Nov. 21, Miss C. C. Stopes will lecture on "Why do Women want the Suffrage."

London: Stamford-street.—The Sunday-school anniversary services on Sunday last, conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards (children's service) in the afternoon, the Rev. V. D. Davis in the evening, and the Rev. Frederic Allen in the morning, were largely attended, a special feature being the beautiful hymns sung by the scholars at each service. On Monday evening, at the Social Institute meeting, Miss Mace gave "A Talk About Birds," illustrated by a large number of pictures of birds, shown on the large screen by the lantern, with musical illustrations, by Mrs. A. B. Matthews and Misses H. M. Tayler and W. Gibbs. On Tuesday the 1st Company of the Boys' Own Brigade was presented with a colour (worked by Miss Ada B. Turner) by Miss Marian Pritchard, the presentation being preceded by an inspection of the boys—followed by various evolutions—then they were formed up and stood at attention while Miss Pritchard made the presentation, in the name of her niece, Miss C. B. Turner, herself, and Mr. John C. Ballantyne, the founder and late captain, now removed from London. Sergeant H. Batt, having received the colour, the company saluted while the National Anthem was played. The brigade hymn, "Lend a Hand," having been sung, Miss Pritchard gave a charming address on the meaning of the flag, which is worked in yellow and black, the colours of the brigade. The boys, she said, must remember that they belonged to God's Kingdom, and when they looked at their flag, think of what it symbolised. The colours were those of sunshine and shadow, but they must not forget that it was yellow behind the black—God's light of truth removing all darkness by its clear radiance. The members expressed their thanks in a very hearty fashion, Mr. F. E. Allen, the captain, and the Rev. F. Allen adding words of warm acknowledgment.

Lye.—A Sale of Work was held on Monday, Nov. 4, opened by Mr. J. T. Worton, Chairman of the Urban District Council. Received in donations, or promised, £42 5s.; gross proceeds of Sale of Work, £16 14s. 7d. The Rev. I. Wrigley, Chairman of the Wollescole School Board, has also been elected a member of the Lye School Board, his object being to try and bring about the amalgamation of the two Boards.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—A bazaar, in the form of an old English village, was held in the local Town Hall last week. The city was wrapped in dense fog on the opening day, but after that the weather improved, and the attendances were very satisfactory. The bazaar was opened on successive days by Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Alderman W. B. Bowring, J.P., Mr. William Long, J.P., and Councillor Marsden, and the chair was occupied in turn by Mr. J. Dendy, Colonel Pilcher, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and Mr. D. A. Little. The opening addresses bore generally upon the relation of a Free Church to the public life of the city and country, and the present urgent need for a higher standard in public affairs, which Sir J. T. Brunner further emphasised by a weighty reference to the Concentration Camps in South Africa. All the gentlemen engaged in the opening ceremonies set an excellent example to customers in their generous patronage of the various stalls, which Sir John Brunner supplemented by a most handsome donation of £50. The total result of sales and subscriptions was £900. A supplementary Sale of Work will be held in the Church School, when it is hoped that the £1,000 required will be completed.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne.—On Nov. 8 the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Oxford, visited Newcastle for the first of his four lectures on "The Gospels in the Nineteenth Century," which was delivered in the Lovaine Hall, to an attentive audience of over 200, drawn from all denominations. In the afternoon of that day Mr. Carpenter attended a meeting in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, in support of the National Conference Ministers' Superannuation Fund, and was warmly welcomed, the Rev. Frank Walters presiding. He gave an address explaining the origin, objects, and methods of the fund, after which Mr. George G. Laidler proposed a resolution of thanks to Mr. Carpenter for his address approving of the superannuation scheme, resolving to promote the financial interests of the fund among the churches of the district. He said that although the current year had for the Newcastle congregation been one of exceptional expenditure, owing to the new organ, bazaar, &c., he felt, nevertheless, that the warmest support was due to this well-prepared scheme of a Pensions' Fund, and that many friends in the North would wish to identify themselves with it. He thought that if it were practicable to provide for annuities from the age of sixty rather than of sixty-five, as proposed, it would be all the better; and also if the scope of the scheme could be widened, so as to allow of ampler provision for widows. The Secretary of the congregation seconded the resolution, and the Treasurer of the Church, the Secretaries and the Treasurer of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association and other friends having supported it, the vote was carried unanimously. Several contributions to the fund were promised. Afterwards tea was provided in the adjoining schoolroom.

Norwich.—On a vacancy in the School Board, caused by the resignation of an Independent candidate, the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., minister of the Octagon Chapel, was on Monday elected to the seat. Two candidates were nominated, and Mr. Hall was elected by the casting vote of the Chairman. Dr. Blyth, his proposer, was elected to the vice-chair. At the same meeting of the Board, a letter was read from Mr. I. M. Wade, resigning his seat on the ground of failing health.

Tunbridge Wells.—At the annual meeting, on Oct. 27, of the Free Church, the services of which are held in the reading-room at the Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, the Hon. Secretary presented a report of the year's work, which stated that, although there had been no considerable increase in membership, the church was in a stronger position than a year ago. The congregation were united not only in the desire to proclaim the truth, but to do the best they could in the service of mankind. At the special anniversary services, a beautiful reading-desk, the gift of Mr. J. J. Dodd, was publicly dedicated. A special Summer Flower Service and Harvest Thanksgiving had also been held. Thanks were accorded to various members for helpful offices in connection with the church, and included the services of Messrs. Dodd and Tubbs in the pulpit; and also to the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards for his help in filling the pulpit, and to the visiting ministers. The report concluded with the expression of a strong desire for a separate building, the property of the congregation, which could be used not only for the Sunday services, but for educational work. It was noted that a building fund had been opened.

MR. JOHN HARWOOD is prepared to give DRAMATIC RECITALS of two hours duration from Shakspere, Dickens and other authors; also a novel Lecture, entitled "The Art of Public Recitation: its Humours and Difficulties—a Leaf from my Own Experience," followed by one hour of illustrative Recitals, to Societies connected with Unitarian or Free Churches, upon exceptional terms and without risk.—Address, Fair View, Pendleton, Manchester.

BY BENJAMIN WALKER.

"There are many good things in this book. Throughout there runs a strong vein of theism, healthy and optimistic."—CHRISTIAN LIFE.

"We sympathise to a great extent with the author's dissatisfaction with formal philosophy and conventional religion, and agree that Stoicism properly understood offers a better refuge for the human mind. Mr. Walker's philosophy is not pure stoicism, as it is modified by Christian Theism, and the combination is productive of a cheerful optimism. The author says many sensible things. The book ought to be popular, and we wish it success."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE news of the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, which we have this week to record, will not come as a surprise to those who knew in what broken health he returned from India in the spring, but it will be received with widespread sorrow in this country, especially in the several congregations which he served with so much acceptance, while in India we are sure that the loss will be deeply felt. It was in March that Mr. Williams's health finally gave way, and he was obliged to relinquish his work in Calcutta. He went up to Darjeeling, hoping there to regain his strength, but without avail, and on April 30 he sailed from Calcutta for home. Since his return he has stayed at Brighton, with all his interests unabated, hopeful and cheery to the last. Though suffering from some fatal internal malady he was happily spared from acute pain, and would be thankful, as he would wish his friends to be, that the end came for him without any longer weary lingering. The funeral service is to be held at the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, Hackney, at noon to-day (Saturday). A memorial service will be conducted on Sunday morning by the Rev. H. M. Livens at Christ Church, Brighton, and although we have not received any other definite notice, memorial references will doubtless also be made in the churches which were the scene of our friend's ministry.

SINCE our last note on the subject of the mortality in some of the Concentration Camps in South Africa many resolutions of protest by public bodies have been past, and we have received a resolution passed by the congregation of Unity Church, Gateshead, and a note as to a memorial, signed by the minister and a considerable number of the worshippers at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, which has been forwarded to Lord Salisbury, calling his attention to the terrible mortality caused by the condition of the Concentration Camps in South Africa which they regard as a reflection upon the Christianity and the honour of the Empire, and urging that such immediate steps be taken as may relieve the present sufferers, and prevent the recurrence of so grave a loss of helpless lives in the future. No announcement has yet been made by the Government at all calculated to relieve the painful anxiety and the shame with which we cannot but think of this matter.

THE annual report of the American Unitarian Association, for 1901, of which we have been very glad to receive a copy, contains the record of a large amount of strenuous work. It opens with the address of the President, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., from which we quoted some striking passages in THE INQUIRER of July 6. The report of the Secretary, the Rev. C. E. St. John, embodies a number of interesting reports from District Secretaries, who tell of the progress of the work in different parts of the country, or offer suggestions as to various needs. Thus the Rev. G. W. Stone, Field Secretary for the Pacific Coast, writes :—

It is my opinion that our prospects for success will be favourably affected as our ministry is re-enforced by the entrance of men who believe in religion with all their minds and hearts, and who are ready to make sacrifices for it. Such men, if they are willing to enter upon work in a new territory, can extend our influence much more readily now than at any previous time. Wherever our views of religion are presented in the real Christian spirit, they find many who are ready to accept them and to enlist in their support.

Mr. Stone is of opinion that the prospects of the cause on the Pacific Coast would be greatly improved if there could be a training school for ministers in connection with one of the Universities, and says that either in the University of California at Berkeley (where the Rev. F. L. Hosmer is minister) or at Stanford University a chair for the teaching of Liberal Religion could be founded. He also holds that it would be a great gain if two or more men of discretion, courage, and preaching power would take up what, for want of a better term, he calls field preaching, to go from place to place, to test the religious needs of new settlements, and see where churches might be established. And he adds :

You ask for "conviction as to immediate prospects for our cause." I answer that such prospects depend upon our ability to occupy the great opportunities offered us. We never had such opportunities. The great need, as I see it, is for men.

In an appendix further particulars of work are given, among which we note with special interest that the Rev. Clay MacCanley, who last year returned from Japan, has been working for four months as a special agent in the South, and reports that of the Southern States Texas offers the best field for work; also, that the Rev. Florence Buck has served since September, 1900, as Field Agent in Michigan, with great success, and "has followed the wise method of devoting herself to one place after another sufficiently long to create a new interest, and leave the church to the care of a settled minister." The Rev. Mary A. Safford also has a great record of work, having preached or lectured 128 times during the year, and attended 134 conferences and committee meetings and travelled 12,103 miles.

THE second and third of Mr. Stopford Brooke's Thursday evening lectures at University College completed his study of Matthew Arnold's poetry. Speaking of "Empedocles on Etna," which was first published in 1852, Mr. Brooke said that through the lips of Empedocles Arnold spoke of the problems of his own time, but in his next volume, in 1853, which for the first time bore his name, he left the poem out, as too exclusively given over to wailing, and only restored it to its place among his poems twenty years later, at the instance of Browning. In the interval, instead of cutting the knot as Empedocles did, by throwing himself into the crater of the volcano, Arnold had worked through his problems, but had also worked out his vein of poetry. But while his creative power as a poet was exhausted, his intellectual power grew keener and keener, and what further help he had to give was given in prose. The shorter lyrics which followed "Empedocles" touched on various fragments of the problems of life, marking some progress towards a happier outlook. "Self-dependence" was a bit of modern Stoicism, modern because its conception of Nature was alien to the thought of the Ancients. Its close was pure Stoicism, that weary reference to the soul alone as the source of strength, in self-isolation that enfeebled strength, and if the gods did not intervene would slay love altogether. The "Lines written in Kensington-gardens" were better, and if only he could have felt his prayer, "to feel with others," he would soon have found peace :

Calm soul of all things! make it mine
To feel, amid the city's jar,
That there abides a peace of thine,
Man did not make, and cannot mar.

The will to neither strive nor cry,
The power to feel with others give!
Calm, calm me more! nor let me die
Before I have begun to live.

The best of all those fragmentary, baffling poems was "A Summer Night." In the two poems on "Obermann," separated from one another by twenty years, the change in Arnold's frame of mind was also to be seen. His poems were valuable as history, as well as profoundly moving to those who had been through the same inward conflicts, in the period between 1840 and 1870, when science and historical criticism and new democratic ideas were changing all men's ways of thinking, when old fabrics were shaken to their foundation, and the new temple was not yet built. Looking back they saw that the times were not nearly so bad as Arnold thought, nor was their restless confusion really evil. New ideas were flowing into the world, and new creative powers were at work. In 1877, when Arnold collected his poems, he saw more clearly the good coming out of evil.

In his lyric and elegiac poems, Mr. Brooke said, Arnold is at his best. Having sorrow at the root of his life he excelled in elegy. The severe beauty and intellectual force in those poems gave them not only strength but intensity. In the memorial verses on Wordsworth his soothing and healing power was contrasted with Byron's force and Goethe's calm. Few things had been better said and with more delightful finish than the verses which told of Wordsworth's influence on his youth:—

He found us when the age had bound
Our souls in its benumbing round;
He spoke, and loosed our heart in tears.
He laid us as we lay at birth
On the cool flowery lap of earth,
Smiles broke from us and we had ease;
The hills were round us, and the breeze
Went o'er the sun-lit fields again;
Our foreheads felt the wind and rain.
Our youth return'd; for there was shed
On spirits that had long been dead,
Spirits dried up and closely furl'd,
The freshness of the early world.

In the lines on Rugby Chapel, written under the control of deep filial feeling the close was noble, and in the whole poem there was so great a sincerity and so serious a spirituality that no one could read it without being thrilled with sympathy. But the two best poems Arnold wrote were "The Scholar Gypsy" and "Thyrsis," both engaged with Clough. They were suffused throughout with the tenderness of that deep friendship which may exist between man and man, beginning in youth and keeping always something of the purple light of youth, yet continued into manhood, winning strength of love, which perseveres through sad experience, and beauty born of, and cherished by, associated memory. The third lecture was concluded by a beautiful reading of the latter part of "Thyrsis." These notes have to be completed before Thursday evening, and we can only say here that the lecture this week was to be on Rossetti.

An effort is being made to raise a sum of £2,000 to endow a bed in the New Hospital for Women in Euston-road, for patients suffering from cancer, as a memorial to the late Emperor and Empress Frederick of Germany. There must be many people in this country, both English and German, who would be glad of such an opportunity of expressing their profound admiration for the character and gifts of the late Emperor and Empress and their services to humanity. The Empress Frederick took so deep an interest in the welfare and advancement of women, that the proposed memorial would seem to be peculiarly appropriate. Contributions to the Emperor and Empress Frederick Memorial Fund will be gratefully received by Miss Jenner, 39, Addison-road, Kensington, London, W. (cheques should be drawn to Miss L. A. Jenner's order and crossed Messrs. Barclay and Co. (Limited) account of the Emperor and Empress Frederick Memorial), or may be paid direct to the account of the Emperor and Empress Frederick Memorial at Messrs. Barclay and Co. (Limited), 1, Pall Mall East, London, S.W.

On Monday, 25th inst., at 8 P.M., a public meeting, in connection with the Fulham Constituency work of the Central Society for Women's Suffrage, will be held in the West Kensington Lecture Hall, Baron's Court-road (two minutes' walk from the West Kensington Station in North End-road), at which Hon. Geoffrey Howard (son of the Earl of Carlisle, and brother of Viscount Morpeth, M.L.S.B.) will take the chair. Among the speakers announced are Lady Cecilia Roberts, Miss Mordan, and Mr. R. Raikes Bromage, F.R.G.S.

MIRAGLIA.

Sir,—I have much pleasure in reporting about our friend Bishop Miraglia the following, which I translate from the last issue of the Italian weekly, L'Evangelista, of Rome:—

"The Tribune, of Geneva, writes that on Wednesday, Nov. 6, the Independent Bishop Miraglia, in the Methodist Episcopal Italian Church of Terraillet, delivered an interesting lecture.

"He began, as usual, by explaining why he wears a Bishop's insignia; then he spoke of his condemnation, which he attributed to the influence still, alas! possessed by the Vatican over too many magistrates in Italy.

"Of Italy and the Italians, he said that the Italians are endowed with quick understanding; living abroad they can and do assimilate whatever they find to be good, except, alas! in matters of religion, whereof as yet they mostly remain ignorant, while the Protestants, having abandoned the superstitions still clinging to the Vatican, have made an immense step forward. The financial and other great difficulties under which Italy is labouring are one result of the said superstitions, which are the true parents of anarchy. The superiority of Protestant countries ought to encourage the Popish nations to follow their example. Referring to the Romish Creed, and especially to auricular confession, he showed their inconsistency with the spirit of Christianity. The lecture was applauded, and Miraglia promises to deliver more of them."

The Evangelista contains, moreover, the following notice sent by Miraglia. It was recently published at the doors of the new premises of the Oratorio San Paolo in Piacenza:—

"D. O. M. (Deo Optimo Maximo), Nov. 2, 1901. Writing the most glorious page of the history of our persecutions, we now priestless Christians, as living stones, as a spiritual house, a holy and royal priesthood, a priesthood handed down to us through the Apostle Saint Peter himself, though denied to us by the usurping Roman Pontiff, do inaugurate on this most auspicious day our reopened Oratory of Saint Paul, the first fruits of the Catholic Independent Church of Italy, in our new house Savonarola, in the street Prevostura, No. 48, Piacenza."

CROSS-STREET CHAPEL, MANCHESTER.

A Lancashire correspondent writes:—In the address by Mr. Carpenter on the religious movement that led to the founding of the Old Meeting House in Mansfield, printed in your last issue, there is a statement in reference to the Cross-street Chapel Trust, which, as it stands, might prove a little misleading. In speaking of the early foundations of Protestant Dissenters, and the dedication of their chapels, Mr. Carpenter is reported as saying, "Sometimes the Presbyterians were specified (as at Cross-street, Manchester), sometimes the Independents; and sometimes they were united in fraternal partnership." The general statement is true enough, but the particular instance cited in illustration needs a slight qualification. According to Sir Thomas Baker ("Memorials of a Dissenting Chapel," p. 37), the earliest deeds relating to Cross-street Chapel and the land on which it stands contain no specific designation of the religious society using it. The deeds of lease and re-lease (1693), and three subsequent sets of deeds, executed respectively in 1713, 1732, and 1746, do not contain the word "Presbyterian." It was not till 1778, in a deed of appointment of new trustees, that the term was introduced into a trust of the chapel. It had been similarly introduced as early as 1761, into a deed of the Charity (1697) of Dame Meriel Mosley, connected with Cross-street. The comment of Sir Thomas Baker is that "it would have been better if the term had not been so introduced, inasmuch as the original Trust is thereby narrowed." The question arises, was the phrase which ran —"commonly distinguished or known by the name of Presbyterians"—intentionally inserted, and, if so, what was the significance attached to it? It is noteworthy that its occurrence in the chapel deeds is later than the time of John Seddon's ministry (1739-1769), during which Unitarianism was first preached in the building. What was the motive for dropping the term at the High Pavement, Nottingham, in 1754, and inserting it at Cross-street in 1778? It was evidently used very loosely and fitfully. Inappropriate as it was it appears to have been retained, or acquiesced in, as a current piece of phraseology. If an article, based on contemporary documents, were prepared for your columns, by some competent hand, on the usage and meaning of the term "Presbyterian" in England in the eighteenth century, it would be doing good service.

LITERATURE.

TEACHING THE LITTLE ONES.*

HERE are admirable helps for the religious teaching of our little ones. Twelve pictures to illustrate twelve hymns, from which a series of lessons on the great truths of religion may be drawn, such as children can understand. And if "Aunt Amy" undertakes to tell us how the little ones may be made to attend and enjoy the lessons, so that their minds and hearts will really be opened to these great truths, we may be sure that we are in the best hands, and the most diffident teacher may take up the work with a good courage and hope.

The whole apparatus, noted below, is for use with an infant class, or for quite small children; but the "Teachers' Note Book" contains the pictures and hymns, and should find a welcome in many homes, for home use, even when there is no need to hang up the big Hymn Sheet, for a whole class to read.

The method of teaching suggested is described in the Introduction by a parable. The teacher is supposed to wish to take her class for a walk in the country, and first of all must select the spot. Then having made all due preparation, she must lead the way, and having reached the point, she must make her company mark the spot. These various stages are clearly explained, and then with each of the hymns, indeed with each lesson, based on successive verses of the hymns, the path is marked out, with much helpful illustrative matter and skeletons of stories, while space is left on the pages for the teacher's own notes in preparation.

"We frequently choose a hymn as the subject of a lesson," Miss Pritchard says, "because it affords one of the best means of leading our children to the thought of God."

Yet how many of our teachers exclaim, "I cannot do this. I am not sufficiently filled with that thought myself." "Ah! it is just for this reason that it will be good for you then to take up such a course of lessons as this," I reply. Dwell with open heart and mind on the wonderful works of creation, and some day you will get behind the things visible to the things eternal, will apprehend the Creator through that which He hath created, and will exclaim in your heart, "Aforetime I heard; now I see!"

"The Beautiful World" is the subject of the first series of lessons, based on the hymn, "All things bright and beautiful." The second hymn is, "Little beam of rosy light," teaching of "God, our Father"; and then follow lessons on "How to thank God," "Little Things," "The Children's Prayer," "Jesus and the Children," and so on. We must not tell more about the lessons, but can assure our readers—and especially those who are looking for such help in the teaching of their children—that if they will patiently take up this book and study its method, putting careful thought and effort into their preparation, they will not be disappointed, but will find that a new power is given them, and a new delight in that most sacred work of leading the little ones to a true knowledge of God.

SHORT NOTICES.

Ideals of Life and Citizenship. Select pieces from the best authors, chosen by C. E. Maurice. "My wish," says Mr. Maurice in the Preface, "has been to cultivate in the minds of elder children, and those just growing into manhood and womanhood, the belief in the possibility of peaceful heroism; to show the power of the sympathy and courtesy, the courageous endurance of suffering on behalf of good causes, and the struggle after all higher conceptions of life; and to impress upon the young that these are at least as necessary for the training of good citizens as the admiration for those more showy acts and utterances which are more universally approved. Along with this higher object I hope to encourage an early preference for the higher kind of literature." The book is issued in an attractive form and is printed in commendably large type. Passages from forty-one authors are given, ranging from Chaucer, More, and Latimer to J. R. Lowell, F. D. Maurice, and Prince Kropotkin, some notes from the life of Sir George Grey, giving in conclusion a fine example of practical statesmanship. The selections from each author are introduced by a note on the man himself (except Mrs. Browning they are all men). Mr. Maurice's selections open, as did Trench's "Household book of English Poetry," with Chaucer's lines of good counsel, "Fle fro the pres, and duelle with soothfastnesse," and we trust that no young people will be deterred by the difficulty of the old English at the outset. Then follows the picture of the Poor Parson from the Canterbury Tales with its famous ending:—

But Cristes lore, and his apostles twelve,
He taught, but ferst he folwed it himselve.

With this may be compared Goldsmith's picture, from the "Deserted Village" of his preacher, "Passing rich with forty pounds a year." There is great variety in the extracts, and the book might well be used as an advanced reading book for thoughtful young people, with a good teacher, the more abstract passages, such as those from Bacon's Essays, and Locke's "Essay on Government" being interspersed with vivid passages such as those from George Fox's Journal, "Pilgrim's Progress," and Walter Scott, while the poets are well represented. (J. R. Henderson, 26, Paternoster-square, 2s. 6d. net.)

The Bible, its Meaning and Supremacy, by F. W. Farrar, D.D., F.R.S., Dean of Canterbury, was first published in 1897, and is now re-issued at a cheaper price, in its original form as a substantial library volume. It is a popular exposition, in the Dean's well-known picturesque and eloquent style, of views as to the Bible now very generally held among educated people. The old doctrine of verbal inspiration is abandoned. The Bible is no longer "The Word of God," but it contains the Word of God. It represents the remains of a much wider literature, and is not homogeneous in its morality; but all incompleteness is completed in the revelation of Christ. Fear of the "Higher Criticism" is deprecated, and the mischief done by extravagant views of the Bible is pointed out. Towards the conclusion there are interesting chapters, giving the testimony of many distinguished men as to the "Supremacy of the Bible" over human thought, and as the chief source of human consolation. This new issue at a more popular price will doubtless be very widely welcomed. (Longmans, Green and Co. 6s. net.)

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

THE LONDON & SOUTH-EASTERN PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

SIR,—I have taken great interest in this Assembly from the day it was formed, and have attended every annual meeting, besides which I have had the honour of being its president for two consecutive years. In my opinion it has done, and is doing, all and more than all that was expected by those who started it. Up to the present time it has proved itself a bond of union between the congregations on its roll. It has brought about intimacy, knowledge, sympathy, and friendship between the members of the various churches such as was never before possible, and I do not think that any mischief has been caused by the somewhat heated discussions which took place some years ago as to the desirability or the proper functions of an Advisory Committee.

But I thought at the time, and still think, that a mistake of far-reaching consequences was made at the last Assembly by appointing a committee to report to the annual meetings as to their view on important public questions. I am confirmed in this view even by the letter of Mr. Perris in last week's INQUIRER, and think he is making a bad start for the deliberations of that Committee when he suggests that those who differ from him have "their religion and politics in two water-tight compartments of brain and heart," and is apparently unable to allude to the sad condition of things in South Africa without speaking of it as "the policy of proscription and extermination."

I decline altogether to be labelled as one of those "who would timidly refuse to apply (my) religion to great national and humanitarian issues," and I should be very careful in accusing those who differ from me of such cowardly shrinking, but it is not desirable to introduce topics which are in my opinion altogether outside the question under consideration. The point at issue seems to me this: Can the Assembly do good to the world at large, to its own churches, or to individual members of those churches by asking nine of its own delegates, chosen somewhat hap-hazard at a public meeting, to report to the annual meeting of that Assembly the conclusions they come to on any grave public questions then before the nation? Such reports can in no way go to the world as a pronouncement of the Free Churches. Can any one believe that if there is any backbone to it it will be unanimously adopted by the delegates of the churches? It will either be the report of a majority of the Committee supplemented by a minority report or otherwise a washed out meaningless and ineffective utterance. If it is urged that it is not the report itself but the discussion which will arise upon it, that will be of such great value. I respectfully suggest that a discussion introduced by a single individual (due notice having been given) will be quite as valuable and not open to the same objections. All present, delegates or hon-delegates, might be invited to take part in such a discussion, and if a vote were taken it would be the vote of the meeting and not of the churches.

I am, however, obliged to conclude that the advocates of the Committee and of their report want to get a pronouncement on public matters by the churches themselves. If this is so, the question of appointing delegates so far from being "more legalistic than vital" will become a very vital matter indeed. Hitherto, so far as I am able to judge, delegates have been chosen from the workers of the church without the least reference to their views on certain special subjects, but when it is known that the expressed views of the majority of the delegates will go to the outside public as the expression of the churches themselves, on complex matters concerning political action, congregations will rightly enough try to be represented by the vote of the delegates they select. Again I ask what good can result from this Committee and its report? Is it likely that anyone of the Assembly will have his opinions changed or modified by such, and will not the first result be to force the members of churches into different camps in the selection of their representatives?

EDWIN ELLIS.

Nov. 18.

SIR,—I have read with much interest Mr. Hugh James's letter (THE INQUIRER, Nov. 9), and Mr. Perris's reply (THE INQUIRER, Nov. 16).

Mr. Perris says that to him "it is just as much a religious duty to oppose" (what he calls "the policy of proscription and extermination in South Africa") "as it is to oppose low ideas of the Godhead, and the lack of veracity in theological subscription." He tells us of men to whom "Their religion and their politics (so far as humanitarian and ethical considerations are concerned) are not two water-tight compartments of brain and heart"; and he pleads for "a candid and temperate discussion of these questions in the light of our religion and the pronouncement of a verdict by the predominant conscience of our people."

What I want to point out is, that one may go with him with regard to the first clause of his plea, and utterly reject the second clause. Granting that religious considerations should enter into questions of politics, it seems to me, for that very reason, to be inconsistent with the common ground on which "our people" have taken their stand, that they should in their quasi-corporate capacity seek to pronounce a verdict on such questions. Let us test it by an extreme case. Let us suppose that Mr. Perris had preached a sermon condemning some low view of the Godhead as calculated to blight hope and charity. May he then ask for a resolution protesting against, and pledging his congregation to combat, that low view by every means in their power?

Of course not, we should all say; but why not, if it is allowable to propose resolutions pledging our congregations or assemblies with regard to questions of practical politics?

Turning back to THE INQUIRER of Oct. 12 I find in your "Notes of the Week":—

> It will be for the constituent churches of the Assembly to say whether they consent to be represented in a body which touches on such questions, and attempts in its corporate capacity to bring the influence of religion to bear upon social and national questions.

It seems to me this statement requires two amendments—namely, (1) to insert the words "the individual members of" before "the constituent churches," and (2) to insert the words "as interpreted by a majority" after "the influence of religion."

Is it quite fair to an individual member, who may have joined one of our congregations on being assured that no profession of faith would be required of him, to ask his assent or dissent in respect of any resolution dealing with such questions?

Whether such of our members as desire to pronounce a judgment on any public question should arrange to meet for that purpose at a separate time and place, is not, pace Mr. Perris, a mere question of machinery. In the one case the judgment so pronounced goes forth to the world with whatever weight ought to attach to the judgment of particular persons, and it binds no one else. In the other case the pronouncement purports to bind all the constituent members of the body. I recognise the temptation it must be to those who feel strongly that the moral right requires a particular treatment of an urgent political problem, to grasp at any opportunity of obtaining as weighty a pronouncement as may be in favour of that course. But I venture to say that for such a one to make use of any authority or influence his position in our body may give him, in order to obtain, however conscientiously, an expression of our quasi-corporate approval, is not a legitimate use of our organisations, and it is a use which should be regarded with extreme jealousy.

We hear much of the duty of veracity in regard to theological subscription. What about veracity with regard to political subscription? Mr. Perris refers to certain social matters, and I suppose he means to suggest that our Watchmen, so to speak, ought from time to time to formulate a policy for us in these matters. He asks "will Mr. James forbid us also to speak of these at our public assemblies?"

All that I, at all events, am contending for is, that we should not be embarrassed by being asked to vote about them at our public assemblies. A notion seems to obtain that a discussion without a vote comes to a lame and impotent conclusion.

But surely this depends on what the nature and objects of the discussing body are. An assembly which votes, purports, or at least desires, to have some authority, be it only a debating society which plays at having authority.

Why cannot our denominational meetings be content with such discussions as may inform our minds and consciences, leaving each of us to seek elsewhere the appropriate organisation for promoting the cause he may think to be right? To go further, so it seems to me, is to usurp an authority foreign to the basis on which the individuals who belong to our body have associated themselves together.

GEO. CARSLAKE THOMPSON.

P.S.—If your space allows, I should like to refer to the "Social and Political Education League" (of which I was some time treasurer), founded by my old friend, the Rev. Henry Solly. The early practice was—and, no doubt, still is—to hold discussions without a formal vote.

The same practice has been adopted and maintained by a Cardiff Society which had the honour of an inaugural address from the lips of the late Sir John Seeley. The address will be found in the Contemporary Review for July, 1888. G. C. T.

Penarth, Nov. 19.

Sir,—Objecting as I do to party political discussions either at our Assemblies or in the columns of The Inquirer, I am not going to trouble you with a refutation of Mr. Perris' one-sided attitude, other than to state that his insinuation that these protests emanate from a party source is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Perris states:—"If it is simply desired to have a separate time and place for our people to pronounce judgment on these topics—well and good." This would be all that could be desired, if added thereto it was stated in an honourable, straightforward and honest manner, when discussing party subjects, that the meeting represented those present only, and not the general body of our denomination.

THE SELF AND ITS FREEDOM.

Sir,—I had no intention of re-appearing in this controversy, but as Mr. Lummis in his reply to Mr. Badland, and also in his previous letter, has, in describing my views, used such words as "causation" in a sense special to his own, apparently Idealist, philosophy, and has thereby, of course, made the Libertarian's position appear absurd, it is necessary, in order to prevent your readers from carrying away from this discussion an utterly incorrect impression of the doctrine which I am concerned to defend, that I should be allowed to state my conception of man's Moral Freedom in terms of that philosophy of Causation which approves itself to my judgment as fundamental and true.

Mr. Lummis asserts that the Self's free moral decisions, as explained by me, are "facts which have no cause." Now I most firmly believe that there neither is, nor can be, any event or phenomenon, physical or psychical, which does not proceed from the activity or causality of a real, that is, a non-phenomenal Cause, whether that cause be, as our human selves are, created and dependent, or, as God is, self-existent and original. Be my decision in a moral crisis noble or base, be it uplifting or degrading in its effect upon my character, I freely make it, I am its real cause, and therefore morally responsible for it.

But here it becomes evident that Mr. Lummis and I attach quite different meanings to this word "causation." It is used by him to express what he conceives to be a necessary relation between successive phenomena, whereas I, in common with many well-known thinkers, among whom Dr. Martineau holds a distinguished place, believe that all our ideas of Power and Cause have their source in the Self's immediate consciousness of its own causal activity, and are therefore essentially metaphysical in their character. Mr. Lummis, rightly reminds me that I do not know my Self and its Causality in the same way in which I know the objective world. I quite agree with him; but I must be allowed to add that if I do not become acquainted with them in that way, I, nevertheless, come to know them in a more immediate and inward way; I know them because I feel them, because I am directly conscious of or aware of them.

Hence it is quite compatible with my conception of Causation, to believe, as I do, that there exist causes, such as inanimate objects and irrational animals, which, having no consciousness of an ideal, can only exercise their causal power in one determinate way; and that, on the other hand, there exist higher causes, or, it may be, causes in a higher stage of psychical evolution, which can, under certain circumstances, choose between two equally possible ways of exercising their causality. The struck billiard-ball can only move in one definite line; the tree by the seaside cannot but be deflected in the direction of the prevailing wind; and even the lower animals appear to be incapable of free choice between their competing impulses and can only act in accordance with the strongest among them. But as soon as rationality dawns in the evolving animal, and the incipient man begins to realise the claims of an immanent moral Ideal, and to distinguish between those claims and his own private desires, then, it appears to me, the conditions of Moral Freedom are present, and the human Self becomes capable in times of temptation of freely exercising its power of attending, i.e., its causality, either on the side of the felt Moral Imperative, or on the side of its personal cravings for pleasure or for gain.

In your Leader for Nov. 9, you quote from an admirable Address, by the Rev. W. C. Gannett, a sentence which seems to me to exactly express my view of the rational Self as a Cause capable of willing in favour of either the higher or the lower of the motor influences which conflict within it. His words are: "Temptation is as old as it is new; sin is still sin—the fall of man, when he might, if he had willed it, have risen." By using the word "might," which I have italicised, instead of "would," Mr. Gannett clearly recognises the fact that it was equally open to the sinner, at the moment of moral decision, to have willed otherwise.

Now it is quite clear that if the Eternal Cause or Will has called into existence rational selves, capable in the moral crises of their history of making a free or original choice between the motive principles which struggle within them, and by its free acts of attention helping either the one or the other to achieve the victory, there must be in the sphere of human conduct certain psychological changes which lie intrinsically beyond the range of complete scientific explanation. Here, however, Mr. Lummis's acute letters pertinently suggest to me the reflection that, if Kant's account of the Category of Phenomenal Causation be correct, these alleged features in human conduct that do not admit of being scientifically accounted for must be regarded as violations of the law of causation, or, as Mr. Lummis puts it, are "facts which have no cause." But Mr. Lummis is, no doubt, aware that Kant, in other passages, uses the word "Cause" in a very different sense, in a metaphysical sense which is closely akin to the sense in which I use it; and it seems to me clear that it is by this double meaning which Kant gives to "causation" that he is plunged into hopeless inconsistency when he endeavours to harmonise his conception of the phenomenal or psychological self as completely determined with his other conception of the metaphysical or real self as completely free or undetermined in its moral choice. For myself, I agree with libertarian thinkers generally, and also with John Stuart Mill and Huxley, that Kant has not succeeded in showing that his so-called category of phenomenal causation, which plays such a leading part in Hegelian speculations, is a necessity of human thought; and therefore, in my judgment, the fact asserted by believers in the freedom of the will that there are features in human conduct which are not amenable to full scientific explanation involves no violation of any necessary "law of causation," and no existence of facts without causes, but is simply the natural result of the exercise of that freedom of preferential choice between motives of unequal moral worth which the Eternal has conferred on those rational souls whom He has created and evolved that they may at length be qualified to enter upon free moral and spiritual relations with Himself. Nor can I find any solid ground for Mr. Lummis's somewhat alarming statement that the libertarian postulate of man's free causality in temptation "rends up Logic by the roots"; especially when I call to mind that so pronounced a libertarian philosopher as Hermann Lotze wrote a very elaborate treatise on Logic, containing such excellent ideas that the distinguished Oxford Idealist, Dr. Bernard Bosanquet, thought it quite worth his while to clothe them in an English dress.

I have only tried to show that Mr. Lummis's charge that the Free-will theory involves the absurdity of holding that there are facts which have no causes is only valid when the word "causation" is used in a sense which the Free-willers themselves entirely repudiate. I have no expectation that either Mr. Lummis or Mr. Badland will accept my theory of the Self and its Freedom. To me it seems certain that we only gain a rational ground for true moral responsibility when we believe that there is in the human personality no interior necessity that the Self should side with either the higher or the lower of the conflicting motives which arise out of its character, and that, therefore, there can be no explanation given why in temptation it makes its momentous choice. As Lotze remarks, a decision for which a complete why can be found, is ipso facto an outwardly or inwardly necessitated decision. If, however, I understand my friendly opponents rightly, it seems equally certain to them that such a Self as this, capable of freely choosing between equally possible alternatives, is inconceivable, and that, even if it were conceivable, it would be irresponsible. Here, then, it would seem that there is nothing left for us but to agree to differ.

In conclusion, I hope your readers will understand that the main purpose of this letter is neither to provoke further controversy nor to attack Mr. Lummis's philosophical position—though I hold him to be, indeed, "a foeman worthy of one's steel"—but simply to prevent the serious misunderstanding and injustice which must inevitably arise when the views of a thinker of one school of thought are defined, without sufficient explanation, by words which have derived a special meaning from the doctrines of a quite different school.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

ONLY three weeks ago we published the valuable report on his experiences and work in India presented by Mr. Fletcher Williams to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and it is now our sorrowful duty to record his death. In a leading article with which we prefaced Mr. Williams's report, reference was made to his very serious illness, so that our readers may not have been unprepared for this news. Mr. Williams had been staying at Brighton, tended by his daughter, Mrs. Nisbet, able till the very end to enjoy the visits of old friends. Only on Friday of last week the chairman of the Indian Committee of the Association had gone down to take to him a special grant from the Association as a token of sympathy in his illness and of warm appreciation of his work in India, and Mr. Williams then spoke very cheerfully of himself, hoping still to regain his old strength; and save for difficulty in breathing and the weariness of growing weakness, he was free from pain. The Rev. H. M. Livens was a constant, cheering visitor. On Tuesday, for the first time during his long illness, Mr. Williams kept his bed, the difficulty of breathing having grown much worse during the last few days, and on the afternoon of that day, in his daughter's presence, with hardly a moment's warning, he passed away.

Samuel Fletcher Williams was a native of Shrewsbury, where he was born Oct. 14, 1842. His family belonged to the Methodist New Connexion, and two elder brothers became Methodist ministers, of whom the second, James Clayton Williams, subsequently became a Unitarian, following in his younger brother's steps, and after holding various appointments in our churches, died at Hastings in 1887. Fletcher Williams as a youth left the Methodist connection and joined a Congregational Church, intending to enter the ministry, but the doctrinal profession required before he could be admitted to Spring Hill College, Birmingham, deterred him, and he turned to journalism instead. Working in his native town he became Editor of the Shrewsbury Free Press, and became well known as an ardent politician. For the extension of the franchise, the abolition of Church Rates, the Disestablishment of the Irish Church he rendered yeoman's service, and to the end of his life he retained his active interest in all movements for the advancement of the people. While engaged in journalism he did not relinquish his study of theology, and still looked forward to the time when he might be able to devote himself to the ministry of religion. In this purpose he was strengthened by the Rev. J. R. McKee, the Unitarian minister at Shrewsbury, and in 1870, in his twenty-eighth year, he accepted a call to Bethlehem Chapel at Newchurch, in Rossendale. This was a very happy settlement for him and his wife, also a native of Shrewsbury, whom he had married eight years before. Like their new minister the congregation of Bethlehem Chapel was sprung from Methodism, and having separated from the body after the expulsion of Joseph Cooke, formed an independent church in 1808, and through study of the Scriptures became Unitarian.

Mr. Williams came to Rossendale in the early days of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, when John Wright was at Bury, and at once took an active part in all the work of the district. It was in the period when much was heard of the conflict between science and religion, and his thoughtful dealing with that subject as with other aspects of liberal religion met with warm acceptance, not only in his own congregation, but in the churches round about. On the subject of Science and Religion he gave a notable course of Sunday evening lectures which were fully reported, and led to a controversy with the Rev. W. L. Watkinson, now so well known as a Wesleyan minister and editor of the London Quarterly Review. The correspondence continued week by week for some months, being followed with the keenest interest in Rossendale, and the whole was afterwards separately published by Mr. Williams's congregation. He was a very ready speaker, and his thoughtful sermons, carefully prepared, were an educative influence, to which many who were young men at that time still gratefully look back. At anniversary services, and at the meetings of various societies in the district, he very soon became a most welcome speaker. His influence over the young people of church and school was marked, and to his stimulus and guidance was due the entrance of the Rev. J. J. Wright into the ministry, whom he carefully prepared for college.

Mr. Williams's journalistic ability was early enlisted in the cause, and after having been for some years a contributor to the Unitarian Herald, in 1879 he joined the Rev. James Black as editor, in succession to the Revs. W. Gaskell and Brooke Herford, continuing in that position until the absorption of the Herald in the Christian Life in 1889. To THE INQUIRER also he was for many years a regular contributor, and wrote occasionally for the Boston Christian Register, as well as for the daily Press.

After a ministry of six years at Newchurch, during which time new schools were built, Mr. Williams removed to Liverpool, and from 1877 to 1884 was minister at Hamilton-road. There again his ready eloquence met with warm response, and he threw himself vigorously into various congregational and public activities. He was a popular lecturer, particularly on literary and biographical subjects, not only in Everton, where his church was situated, but in the city and neighbourhood, and he also wrote for the Liverpool Mercury.

In successive ministries at Newhall Hill, Birmingham (1884-89), Scarborough (1889-93), and Hackney (1893-98), the same gifts found their opportunity, and it was greatly to the regret of his London congregation when Mr. Williams resigned in order to undertake his Indian mission. His wife had died in the previous December, and his two daughters were married, the one in Paris, the other in Canada, so that he felt free to devote himself to that service.

Mr. Williams sailed for India in September, 1898, intending to complete a full three years of service there, but his health having given way, he came home in the spring of this year. Our leading article on Nov. 2 briefly sketched the course of his work in India, and his own reports from time to time had kept us fully informed of his varied and strenuous activities. His final report was a masterly review of the situation in India as regards the progress of religious thought and life, and this story need not be repeated here. Our only regret now is that he would seem to have given himself too unsparingly to that service, but at the same time this must come, especially to our brethren of the Brahmo Somaj in India, not with regret and sorrow only, but with gratitude and admiration for labours so self-forgetful, which will carry home his word to them with new force, and may, we trust, so prevail that his sacrifice shall not have been in vain.

The work Mr. Williams did in India was very cordially appreciated not only in Brahmo circles, but over a much wider field and particularly at University centres, where students and teachers alike were attracted in large numbers to his literary lectures, and to his discourses on religious subjects. His central effort was for the strengthening of spiritual religion, marked especially by the success of the Albert Hall services in Calcutta in the latter part of his time, and his most earnest appeal to his brethren in India was that the various sections into which the Brahmos are now unhappily divided should seek common ground in brotherly union in works of practical beneficence, and should keep steadfastly in view the hope of a closer spiritual union.

Mr. Williams's activity in India included a large amount of writing, in articles contributed to various papers, and some of these have since been gathered up in a little volume published in Calcutta. His only other book, so far as we are aware, was published in 1885 by the B. and F.U.A. with the title "Beliefs and Opinions of a Unitarian," gathering together a number of articles contributed to the Unitarian Herald, THE INQUIRER, Christian Register, and other periodicals, with one or two lectures. A few copies of this book are still to be had at Essex Hall, and some of the articles are also in use as popular tracts.

We must now bid farewell to our friend, sorrowful that his life should be cut short, while he still looked forward to years of useful work, but thankful that up to the end his work was so worthily completed.

The funeral service is to be held at the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, Hackney, at noon to-day (Saturday).

MRS. C. F. STEVENS, NORWICH.

BY the death of Mrs. C. F. Stevens, which took place suddenly on Friday, Nov. 15, though there had been previous warnings that she was suffering from heart-disease, the Octagon Chapel loses one of its oldest and most faithful workers. Her father was Thomas Starling, a member of the chapel, and the first secretary of the Brotherly Society. Born in 1819, she was devotedly attached to the Octagon all her life, and was interested in most of its varied work. For eighteen years she was mistress of the day schools connected with the chapel until, in 1866, she married Mr. Stevens. For more than half a century she acted as honorary secretary and treasurer of the Sisterly Society, one of the earliest sick societies to commence an Old Age Pension Fund, and its success has been largely due to her skill and efforts.

And for fifty years she acted as teacher and superintendent of our Girls' Sunday-school. In 1892, an address signed by more than 100 past and present teachers, elders, and scholars, and an accompanying gift, were presented to her upon her retirement. Many of her old scholars lose through her death a kind friend and a trusty counsellor. Being very simple in her ways, no one felt the slightest diffidence in approaching her, or any hesitation in asking her advice. To the last she was capable of entering into the thoughts and interests of the young, intelligent and helpful in conversation, and very anxious to be of service.

A memorial service was held in the Octagon on Sunday last. She was highly respected by all who knew her; and the Rev. W. H. Cooke, Vicar of St. Saviour's, Norwich, took part with the Rev. A. Hall in the funeral service at the Rosary Cemetery, on Tuesday, Nov. 19. A. H.

BOER WOMEN AND CHILDREN FUND.

Sir,—Will you permit me to appeal to your readers on behalf of the above fund. It was instituted some time ago by Mr. Alfred Marks, the hon. treasurer of the Stop the War Committee, to enable those who desired to do so to contribute specially to the alleviation of the sufferings of Boer women and children. Contributions to this fund are sent to the Netherlands South African Association, Amsterdam. There must be many people in Great Britain and Ireland to whom the sufferings of the Boer women and children especially appeal, and, indeed, if ever we are to recover the good-will of the Dutch, we can surely do nothing better than let them see that even in this terrible time we think of the unhappy Boer women and children who have so few friends to help them. The sum of £355 has been already forwarded to Amsterdam, and we are very anxious to send more. Contributions should be sent to Mr. Alfred Marks, at the office of the Stop the War Committee. Harold Rylett.

Hon. Secretary, Stop the War Committee, 4, Howard House, Arundel-street, Strand, London, W.C.

Workers' Aid Society.—The Secretary wishes to remind the members that their contributions to the above Society are due at the end of the current month or early in December. She regrets that during the last two years there has been a slight falling-off in the number of members. The Society, which has now been in existence for ten years, has done very good and satisfactory work. Its object is to provide suitable garments for the little invalids in the Winifred House Nursing Home, and larger and stronger clothing to be distributed among some of the London Missions. The conditions of membership are the sending of two garments and a subscription of 6d. yearly to the Secretary, Mrs. Goodwyn Barmby, Mount Pleasant, Sidmouth, who will be happy to supply any further information.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GEOFFREY FOSTER FORDHAM,

March 30, 1890—October 28, 1901.

I am going to tell you about a little boy, and I think that you will like to hear about him, for he was a devoted reader of "The Children's Column," and often talked about the other readers as if they were personal friends, wondering if they found it as hard to be good as he did.

The Inquirer always came addressed to him, and eagerly he enjoyed the privilege of scolding the newsagent if it did not arrive on Saturday. There was no Unitarian Chapel near, so "The Children's Column" always made a kind of sermon for his sister and himself on Sundays, when his mother read and talked religious things, and they sang hymns together. Sometimes we read "The Children's Column" before Monday's lessons, and it made the writing-lesson more interesting if the children copied from the blackboard a motto from the "Column." My little friend in play-time—it was his own idea—cut out the "Column" and pasted it in a home-made book, bound with brown paper, and then he indexed the cuttings, and often read them again. For two-and-a-half years he had a great many illnesses, but he never complained that he had to give up doing as other boys, though for nine years he had been perfectly strong. At last he kept his bed, and the last thing that I read to him in bed was that "Children's Column" about Alfred the Great, which I am sure stirred all your hearts as it did ours. King Alfred and Mr. Gladstone had been his chief heroes, for he was, considering his age, a remarkably sagacious politician, and a true little patriot. That "Column," however, was never pasted in the home-made book. God took our little friend to be with Him in Heaven, and it is because in his short life, according to his childish ability and opportunity, cheerfully bearing much bodily pain and weakness, he, like his great example, King Alfred, "sought to live worthily," his memory is precious to those who love him, and may be helpful to his unknown friends and fellow-readers of "The Children's Column."

Geoffrey Foster Fordham lived in a beautiful old house with creepers round the windows, and chimneys big enough for Santa Claus and heaps of presents to come down every Christmas. He played in a lovely old-fashioned garden where the "Easter birds" laid eggs every Easter Sunday. There are arbours for meals out-of-doors all the summer long, and a weather-beaten sundial to tell the time on sunny days, and an archway under which a pair of house-martins patch up a nest every spring. The garden melts away into fields in which to ride the ponies and run the dogs, and into woods just handy for feeding the fledgelings with worms, for nutting and playing Robin Hood when your overall happens to be Lincoln-green.

Yes, it was a very lovely home, and all the people and animals in it had a large share of the good things of life. But Geoffrey had realised more than most children of his age that boys and girls have no right to enjoy the good things of life until they do their duty honestly, and try bravely to master the hard things, and until they also share the good things with the less fortunate, the weak and the helpless. When his friends think of him it is chiefly of the perfect honesty, the cheerful, unselfish dependableness of his thoughts, and acts, and sayings, and above and through all, his active, forethoughtful, gracious chivalry and loving-kindness. Among all the fun and frolic—and he was one of the merriest of lads—he had two silent rebukes for himself, "That is not Christian" (which he only partly understood) and "That is not gentlemanly."

"It is not gentlemanly" to neglect your dog and silkworms, to be too lazy to walk up the hills when driving a small pony, to pass the road-mender and carters every day without touching your hat, to make a noise when your father or mother has a headache, to let the "black dog" settle on your back at lessons when your teacher is trying to make them interesting, to write untidy letters to friends, to make other people miserable when you have to bear pain.

I like to think of the seven-year-old who stopped the new cook on the stairs, and said, "Cook, I want to shake hands with you, and thank you for the nice dinner you cooked to-day."

His opinion at eight years old on Women's Suffrage was: "Well, mother, I think women ought to have the vote before men. They are weaker, and need more help, and it is 'Ladies first' in most other ways."

He gave up singing his favourite "God Save the Queen" because "People have spoilt it by singing it to rejoice at defeating their enemies. The Boers love their country just as much as we love ours."

I used to enjoy watching his modest, courteous, genial helping to entertain not only the carriage-folk, but the "boarded-out children," and old people from the neighbouring Union, who had their regular parties in that dear old hospitable garden. And what friendships in all the cottages for miles round, formed week by week as he drove his mother in his own little pony-cart on all her neighbourly visits to the poor people! Santa Claus went down the cottage chimneys, too, and Geoffrey knew who he was on those occasions. There was one woman who was rather shunned by her neighbours as cold and reserved. But Geoffrey had found out the warm lining to her heart. I asked her one day in his last illness to give me a loaf of her own baking for which he had a sudden fancy. "We'd go wi'out oursel'," she said, beaming, "Mester Geoffrey should have our last loaf rather than he go wi'out."

I love to remember my last errand at his request, to take some chocolates from his bedside to a poor sick woman, and shall never forget her tears, or the messages from one sufferer to another.

Can you wonder that on his last resting-place was laid a wreath sent by the men, women and children from all the cottages in that country-side, and that I wanted to tell you how even a boy of eleven years old can be a power for good far beyond his own home-circle?

"Eh! but we shall miss his bonny bright face," a poor woman said to me, "Master Geoffrey were such a lovable boy, and always such a little gentleman."

So you see trying had met with success.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 23, 1901.

OUR DUTY TO LONDON.

AT the autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, which we reported last week, the general subject dealt with by all the speakers was "Our Duty to London To-Day." The vastness of the problem presented by the crowded millions of the metropolis, the greatness of the need, and the utter littleness of anything our scattered churches have accomplished amid these overwhelming conditions, clearly set forth by more than one speaker, might well daunt any but the most loyal courage, and any but the highest and most self-forgetting faith. Yet if we suffer ourselves to be discouraged we are recreant servants of the Truth, and of that righteousness of GOD which after all is stronger than the most insistent forces of a self-seeking world, and of the Love which is stronger even than Death. It is folly for us to picture our little company of churches as standing alone, matched against the whole embattled forces of evil concentrated in this bewildering city. We are but one little company of the great army, pledged to a common service, in conflict with every form of evil, striving for the victory of the kingdom of GOD on earth. One of the wisest words spoken at last week's meeting was Mr. TARRANT'S, when he warned his hearers not to forget that there were many other agencies, besides those represented in our churches, at work in the same direction, and that our first concern must be simply to see that at our own posts of duty the most effective service was rendered. Even when one reckons up the whole of the forces in London pledged to this service of truth and righteousness and brotherly love, the task remains overwhelming, and the word must go along the line for redoubled efforts, and more strenuous loyalty, for the eager seeking of new recruits for every kind of good work, for more abundant giving, both of means and of personal service, in self-sacrifice which the supreme Love alone can prompt. And with that call sounding in our ears we shall best be roused to the true spirit of loyalty at our own post—not in rivalry with other churches and other agencies for good, but in comradeship—knowing that we have our own work to do, which none of the others can do for us, work which claims far more than any strength and loyalty we have ever yet given to the cause, yet with the happy sense that many other brethren are also in the field, many of them perhaps doing much more and better than we can do, yet all together setting our hands to the great work of GOD.

In face of the problem of London, the duty of the District Unitarian Society, Mr. BOWIE said, was to offer their best thought and life and aspiration, as the most necessary contribution towards a happy issue, for what London stood most in need of was the power of genuine religion. And that word we may accept not for the District Society alone, but for the whole of our religious community.

The service to which we are called at our own post in the great army of the Kingdom is to see to it that where we are the people shall feel the power of genuine religion. The great need is that throughout this vast community there should be living churches, manifesting the strength of a divine life in the world, and to this end we have to do our part. But we must have a care that it is done in the right spirit. We can establish none but Free Churches, and if we are to manifest the power of religion, it must be our own religion, and thereby we shall be declaring the truth and the power of our Unitarianism to the world; but these—the form of church order and of doctrinal belief—must never be allowed to take the first place, if we are to keep the springs of our inspiration fresh and pure; those things are but means to the great end, they are the method by which alone we can do our own work for the Kingdom, but the end must always be kept in view and must hold the first place—the end of a brave and true life with GOD, in human brotherhood, the overcoming of evil with good, in works of enlightenment and uplifting, of compassion and unselfish love.

We are called, then, to maintain churches, and so far as our strength avails to found other churches, but whether they be few or many to see to it always that the true spirit of worship shall be there, that they may be places of rest and of brotherly sympathy, that whoever comes in shall feel the power of truth and purity, of gladness as in a Divine presence, of strong enthusiasm for righteousness and an eager longing for helpful service. Here are to be homes of truth and goodness, where tired way-farers shall be glad to come in, where battlers in the world shall find new insight into duty and new courage to be faithful and their soul shall be uplifted in contemplation of a great ideal. Here shall be a true comradeship of brethren pledged to the warfare of the Kingdom, and at the same time a hidden communion of the seen and unseen, in which the great hosts are gathered for the solace and the inspiration of each humblest worker, and each disciple knows what is meant by the grace and truth of JESUS, the Chief of faithful souls, while all together are enfolded in the FATHER'S love and care.

From such centres of the higher life, homes of true brotherliness, of prayer and thanksgiving and worship of the Holiest, the strongest testimony to truth and righteousness and genuine brotherly love will go out into the world, the true meaning and power of Christianity will be declared and something will be achieved for the Kingdom.

Such must be the churches that we maintain, and for the maintenance of which we call in new helpers—to minister to the world's needs, to bear testimony and to work for GOD. If only with single-hearted purpose we will surrender to that great ideal, it will kindle in us an enthusiasm that will lift us above all littleness in our aims and endeavours, and leave no room for discouragement in our work. And we repeat, it must be done as our share of a greater work, with the thankful knowledge that there are many others, not of our own special communion, who are yet our helpers and encouragers, from whom we have much to learn, who, we may hope, have also something to learn from us, but who in any case are fellow-labourers with us for the one great cause of the Divine Kingdom on earth.

Not any theological propaganda but religious inspiration must stand first in our interest and as claiming the devoted service of our lives. We shall best serve the cause of theological enlightenment by proving the strength of our religion for inspiration and for the victory of righteousness and brotherhood in the world.

THE touching memorial of Geoffrey Fordham, which will be found in this week's "Children's Column," naturally recalls the familiar lines of old Ben Jonson. Those who mourn for a dear child may find some solace in the thought.

It is not growing like a tree
In bulk doth make man better be,
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sere;
A lily of a day
Is fairer far in May,
Although it fall and die that night—
It was the plant and flower of light.
In small proportions we just beauties see,
And in short measures life may perfect be.

HUNGARIAN LETTER.

I AM glad to tell you that just now we are in that most pleasant position when friends and foes alike congratulate the Unitarians on the Kolozsvár College. Though a silent edifice in itself, it is like a gospel, full of inspiration and inspiring. Our college has always been most liberally open for young men, without respect to their confession. No denominational school has had such a mixture of students—Unitarian, Roman Catholic, Calvinian, Lutheran, Jew, Greek have been always well represented in the classes. The Unitarians made up two-thirds of the whole, and still the minority felt quite at home, because they were treated most cordially. A deep and sincere friendship grew up among the students, which they carried out into life. Now we invited all the old students to meet in the new college, and take farewell of the dark old building. Several hundreds were present, some of them eighty years of age. Many of the non-Unitarians also came, and spent, together with the others, a most joyful time. They were present at the opening ceremonies.

The Chief Consistory held its annual meeting together with the opening. We never saw so many Unitarians together at Kolozsvár. Several were there who had not been in the town since they left college, thirty or forty years ago. The opening ceremony was begun early on Sept. 23, first in the consistory, then in the church, and, finally, at the College. Each place was too small to hold all who wished to be there. Of course, the College Festival was the most attractive. Here the Government was represented by Count Béddy. Neither school, college, church, nor office was left unrepresented. Most effective it was to see the President and all the deans of the Koloszvár University in their richly-coloured gowns. Even the army was represented. A considerable part of the hall was reserved for the ladies, who were there in a dense crowd. The students' choir opened the proceedings by singing the national hymn. Bishop Ferencz offered a prayer, beautiful and touching. Chief Curator Daniel made the opening address, and pleased everybody. Baron Horváth, the other Chief Curator, greeted the representatives and representative ministers, and the Burgomaster of the town replied.

The story of the building, old and new, and the importance of the occasion was explained by the Curator of the College, M. F. Kozma. He described the life and work in the old College, which was built and kept up amid the greatest trials and drawbacks. There was a time when not more than three small rooms were there, built almost entirely by the hands of the students. Later, just a hundred years ago, was built of stone and brick the old College, which we left last summer. Many of the most eminent men of the country gained their knowledge in this College, which used to be the principal educational institution, not only at Kolozsvár, but also in the whole of Transylvania. The system of education was very good, but the living of the students was extremely simple and poor. A considerable number of the students earned their living by going out to some work during the early part of the day and in the evening. The food of a poor student was not more than from three to sixpennyworth in the whole day. But this hard struggle meant purification of character and developing of strength.

The modern spirit of the last twenty or twenty-five years could no longer bear that Patriarchal way of life. The need for change and improvement was badly felt. It took some fifteen years of preparation and work to get such a noble College and so much comfort. I am not going to describe the plan of the College in particulars. Let me, however, mention that in the new College boarding is realised in the full English sense of the word, lodging and feeding together. And just fancy that we are able to give sufficiently good and nourishing food for a student three times a day, for 200 crowns for a College year, which sum is equal to about £8 altogether. Now, indeed, one might think that every student could pay this little sum; but we find, that out of the 200 Unitarian students of the College, about 120 are hardly able to pay anything for their living, so poor are their parents. Thanks to our good-hearted Unitarians considerable bequests have been made from time to time, so that about forty can be provided for. Just now a vigorous movement is going on to raise more money for the aid of students. It is pleasant to see that people give willingly.

A most touching scene at the opening meeting was displayed by a representative group of Unitarian young ladies, led by Miss Fangh. The Unitarian girls all over the country had made collections among themselves and made a very rich and beautiful banner, which they presented to the College. Miss Fangh made a suitable and deeply touching speech, explaining their intention. The banner is worked by hand. It is in blue and red, the colours of the College, and has Minerva, the Goddess of Knowledge, painted on it.

There is abundant accommodation in the College. You will be interested to know that the theological students have their own separate part. Formerly they used to live with the other students together. Now they feel quite happy. You know, perhaps, that Miss Tagart's party decided here to make a collection for the Channing theological chair which is not filled, because its fund is too small yet to cover the salary of a Professor. It will be a very great gain to the College if this chair is established. Need I say that thereby the bond of friendship will also be made still stronger.

I think I must write again very soon, because I hear some Austrian has written a very bitter article against Hungary in the Quarterly Review. I hope the readers of THE INQUIRER will not judge before they hear the other side. You know that Austria was wont to look upon Hungary as a faithful tributary to her. Now that the time of this is gone by and Hungary is becoming strong and independent, well, they over there, in their fear of the future, are ready to say all evil things against Hungary. We are very happy that there are English men and women all over the country who are able to judge for themselves in such questions.

THE MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

FORTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE DIRECTORS.

IN the financial year that has just closed, grants have been made to twenty-two widows and fifteen ministers, and also, in two cases, to the orphan children of deceased beneficiary members. During the same period one person in receipt of a grant from the Society's funds has passed away, while two to whom help has hitherto been given have not renewed their applications, the necessity for assistance having ceased. The directors refer with especial pleasure to cases such as these, of which there have been not a few in the course of recent years, where, thanks to the society's timely aid, a period of stress and strain has been tided over, and where relief has been given, during the time that it was needed, from the anxiety consequent on the lack of means to provide for ordinary daily needs. One other class may be shortly referred to—namely, that in which a minister, after many years of steady, good work, is forced to retire owing to increasing infirmity, and where, but for the knowledge that he will receive at the Society's hands that liberal consideration which his life of quiet labour has merited, the outlook for the future would be black indeed; here, again, the helping hand has been held out. The directors venture to think that it would be impossible to point to any part of the Society's work which more entirely fulfils the benevolent aims of its founders than that above outlined.

In the course of the twelve months seven beneficiary members have been added to the roll, making a total of beneficiary members to date of 186.

The proceedings of the Society since the last annual meeting call for little or no detailed notice, with the exception of one matter of importance which has claimed a large amount of careful and anxious consideration on the part of the directors—namely, the subject of the superannuation of ministers; and, as it is possible that there may have been some slight misapprehension as to the directors' position in the matter on the part of those who are not fully conversant with the facts, it may be well to state in a few words what this position really is, and how it has been arrived at. The subject of ministers' superannuation was first brought prominently to the notice of the Unitarian body in a paper by Mr. Cogan Conway, read at the Triennial Conference of Non-Subscribing Churches, held at Sheffield in 1897, when a committee was appointed to consider the whole subject, and to submit a scheme to a future meeting of the Conference. The directors were approached on the subject in a tentative manner in March, 1898, but it was not until December of the following year that the details were laid before them of the proposal formulated by the Conference Committee, and which had then taken the form of an insurance provision for ministers at the age of sixty-five, with a further payment at death. After the fullest consideration of the matter the directors were obliged to intimate to the Committee that, while they felt the heartiest sympathy with them in the objects which they had in view, and desired to express their good wishes for the successful attainment of such objects, they were forced to the conclusion that the scheme, as then suggested, was quite outside the scope of the Ministers' Benevolent Society, as defined by its laws, and that they were consequently precluded from undertaking the management of the proposed fund.

Certain informal interchanges of views took place subsequently between members of the Board and members of the Committee, and the directors were further kept fully in touch with the subject in hand, owing to the fact that the Rev. J. C. Street, one of their body, was also a member of the Conference Committee. Eventually, in November, 1900, the question was again brought officially to the notice of the directors, and in a somewhat modified form, in a letter from the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, the President of the Conference, and Chairman of the Superannuation Committee.

In the meantime, however, the directors had had occasion, in reference to quite another subject, to take the opinion of counsel as to the precise position of the Society with regard to the first of its laws, which define, in explicit terms, the objects for which the Society was founded, and they were advised that, with regard to existing funds, it is not competent to the Society to in any way alter the trusts which the laws, as they now stand, have impressed upon those funds, an opinion which, by the way, coincides with the views more than once previously expressed by other members of the legal profession. The directors were thus able to enter on the consideration of the fresh proposals submitted to them, with the guidance which this opinion afforded, and to arrive at a clear understanding of the Society's position with regard to these proposals.

The subject of Mr. Carpenter's letter was first considered by the directors, at much length, at a special meeting called for the purpose on Nov. 19, 1900, when an earnest desire was expressed, if possible, to meet the Committee by aiding them in the carrying out of the Superannuation scheme; and on the 18th of the following month a deputation from the Committee met the directors, when, after an expression by the President of the anxiety of the directors to aid the Committee by every means in their power, a very full and frank discussion of the whole subject, and its various aspects, took place, the legal difficulties with which the directors were confronted being also clearly explained to the deputation.

Another special meeting of the directors was held in January of the present year to still further consider the subject in the light of what had transpired at the conference with the deputation just referred to, when, after the fullest deliberation, and with every wish to further the aims which have formed the basis of the Conference Committee's labours, the directors again found themselves faced by the conclusion that the constitution of the Society absolutely precluded their aiding ministers insuring for superannuation benefit, as it had been suggested that they might possibly be able to do, and that, for similar reasons, it was not open to them, as directors, to accept the administration of a fund to be applied in carrying out the insurance scheme as submitted by the Conference Committee. At the same time they intimated to the Committee that they would be willing, provided that a sufficient fund were subscribed, and that the requisite authority were obtained from the members of the Society, to undertake the administration of the fund on somewhat wider and more liberal lines than those laid down in the existing laws of the Society. They also again expressed to the Committee their cordial good wishes for the success of their scheme, if this should still be proceeded with, and offered to give them every information in their power which might be of assistance in its conduct, and which did not involve the disclosure of matter of a confidential nature.

The directors trust that the above statement of the course which the negotiations have taken will serve to show what their position has been, and to emphasise the fact that it was impossible for them, under the circumstances, to act otherwise than they have done in the matter.

The following, among other kind contributions to the funds, have been received during the year:—Miss Sharpe (London), £100; Mr. John Harrison (London), £20; Mr. W. G. Harrison (Croydon), £20; Rosslyn Hill Chapel (London), £21 6s. 1d. collection.

The following table gives a concise summary of the amounts expended in grants by the Society since its formation in 1852:—

T. H. RUSSELL, Hon. Sec.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

A CONFERENCE of Teachers and Workers in our Sunday-schools was held in the Memorial Hall last Saturday evening. The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, President of the Association, was in the chair, and in his opening remarks referred to the increasing work in which the Association is engaged, and the great need of additional funds. He also spoke of the changed conditions of life in our Lancashire centres of population, and stated his belief that Sunday-schools were to-day more needed than ever before.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT read a paper on "The Future Work of the Sunday-school." He said his faith in the Sunday-school was as great as ever, and that it was never more potential for real good than at the present time. Their "future work" cannot be anything novel; but a development of old principles. The work of the Sunday-school has run on two main lines—namely, the line of rescuing the children from evil for the children's sake, and the line of either keeping or rescuing the children for their own sake and the Church's sake. The larger and deeper idea is that Sunday-school and Church are one—working on different points, but at one object—whether rescuing or cherishing, yet still with one object—namely, to teach and train human nature in the art of right living in relation to God, to Nature, to one's fellow men both near and far away, and the art of right living within one's own soul. There are few positions of honour and influence—academic, social, civic, national, benevolent, or religious—to which boys and girls, once in our Sunday-schools, have not risen. We are proud of them, and thankful for them. They are the best products of our Sunday-schools, and are God's revelation to us of what we might produce in more abundance. Our aim should be, formation of character. Ask those men and women what essentially it was which the Sunday-school did for them, and they will say it created that environment of good influences which enabled them to find their own better life, and to get fixed in it for good and all. Also, that they there received from some teacher a transference of higher life into their own young souls. Is there not great hope for our work if the Sunday-school could lay itself out, with deliberate design, to cultivate the higher type of life in all whom it can reach, with at least the ardour, patience, and determination of the pigeon-fancier or the pansy-grower? Moral and spiritual life is not a causeless miracle. Sunday-schools are apt to get conservative. In our methods we ought to be prepared for changes—even revolutions if evolutions won't do—remembering that "rest and be thankful" spells ruin, and the school that is satisfied is lost. Suppose we could so train our scholars that they should have high ideals of character, and a "keen sense of personal honour and reverence for all that is greatest and best in human life," would not our homes and churches and cities and country be immensely ennobled thereby? We are not using our time to highest purposes unless our work in all its variety tends towards the conscious formation of moral and spiritual manhood and womanhood. The gravest mistake we can make is to be afraid to speak directly of religion in the teaching and training of our young people. The response of his own young people at Chowbent to the appeals of religious teaching had been a revelation to him—human nature was religious at its centre. There is no greater work in the future than the cultivation of the religious sense; the Sunday-school must produce religious men and women.

Mr. GEORGE SMITH next delivered an address on the same subject. He said the Sunday-schools were the glory of England, and had done more than any other institution, save the churches, in the moral uplifting of the people. Speaking of the avowed decline in the number of scholars and of the failure to attract elder scholars, he said he was no pessimist; the real decline was very small, and there were so many organisations having the same end in view though adopting different methods, that the religious work was going on as vigorously as ever. They must hold fast to the schools so that their scholars may take into the world the spirit which they infuse into them. The present was a transition period. There were three main elements entering into the foundation of Sunday-school life—namely, power of influence, association, service and preoccupation. He advocated more suitable buildings, with adequate class-room accommodation, and more Bible teaching.

The Rev. W. HARRISON deplored the decrease in the number of scholars, and the absence of parents from the Sunday service.

Mr. WIGLEY thought that parents did not sufficiently value the teaching of the Sunday school, and that fathers and mothers were wanted on the teaching staff. He suggested a lectureship in connection with the Association, which would provide a competent enthusiastic teacher periodically to address the elder classes of each school.

Rev. W. R. SHANKS said they had not in the past given sufficient attention to the business side of Sunday-school life. It used to be the practice to have a body of teachers who would visit absent scholars. Where work is neglected the central organisation should have power to step in and see that it is done. He also strongly believed in the examination scheme.

Mr. HOLT said that a missionary spirit should be cultivated, and that scholars themselves should have charge of a neighbourhood. He also advocated the appointment of a man to go round the schools to deliver addresses.

Revs. John Moore, C. Peach and C. Smith, and Messrs. Wright and Ashworth also joined in the Conference.

Music was provided during the evening. There was a fair attendance of teachers present, and it was felt that the Conference had been interesting and inspiring.

NORTH LANCASHIRE AND WESTMORLAND ASSOCIATION.

ON Saturday last there was held in the Percy-street Chapel, Preston, a Conference of Unitarian ministers, members of congregations, and Sunday-school workers from Preston, Chorley, Blackpool (Banks-street and South-shore), Lancaster, and Kendal, the object being to form a union of churches and Sunday-schools for the district. Delegates from the churches and schools of the various towns were present, and some seventy persons sat down to tea, which preceded the Conference. Those present included the Revs. N. Anderton, B.A., Preston; D. Davis, Banks-street, Blackpool; H. V. Mills, Kendal; J. C. Pollard, Lancaster; and A. Doel, Chorley.

At the Conference the chair was occupied by the Rev. N. ANDERTON, who referred to the origin of the proposal to form a union, and then called upon Mr. Newell, who, he said, originated the idea, to read a paper on the subject.

Mr. NEWELL, after dwelling on the importance of the occasion on which they had met, expressed the hope that that meeting would be the beginning of a grand forward movement for the North Lancashire and Westmorland churches of the liberal faith, of the religion of liberty, and of progressive religious thought. At present, he said, we seem to be simply nowhere in point of numbers; our churches are lost in the multitude; our influence does not count; we are incapable of changing or modifying the action of any public body, and our faith bars us. The fault is not, however, in the religion, but that the public know so little about it; that the little they do profess to know is erroneous; they have got it upside down. Our position all round is one of splendid isolation, and by it we are apt to become discouraged when everybody is against us, and we are kept out of all religious movements. No doubt we, ourselves, are somewhat to blame, for many of us sit down and rest content in the idea that truth must prevail. That is just the course I do not like to see adopted, for unless truth bestirs herself, and does not sit with folded hands, she will not prevail; let her arm herself and go forth to fight, and then she will prevail. Another point he wished to make clear was, that we are a diminishing quantity. There are our poor orphans who, having by force of circumstances to remove to other places, find no home there; there are our prodigals who marry into orthodox families; those who have got on a bit and have gone to more popular and prosperous churches; those who have grown up without sufficient interest in our church and go nowhere, or those who are lost owing to a hobby or other attractions. There must be something wrong with the church; it sows but it has no harvest time, no harvesters. Our people in other churches require the food they cannot get in those churches, which they can only get at home. We must devise some means of getting our own at home. We must take a lesson out of the book of our neighbours; we must form Unions; we must concentrate our forces. We must not be faint-hearted because we are few; we must come together and form a grand united fighting square. We must join together, march together, work together in one earnest, hopeful, conquering, missionary effort, well sustained, until the great end is achieved, when they will come from the East and from the West, from the North and from the South, to build up the waste places, to rebuild the temple wherein shall stand those who hold the ancient faith of our fathers, and to which shall return the dispersed of our people from among the orthodox. In conclusion he moved:—

That we, the delegates and friends from the congregations and Sunday-schools of Blackpool (Banks-street and South-shore), Chorley, Kendal, Lancaster, and Preston, inaugurate at this meeting a Congregational and Sunday-school Union of our churches for purposes of mutual intercourse and fellowship, as hereafter to be defined in the constitution to be adopted; and that this resolution be subject to the approval of the congregations and Sunday-schools concerned.

The Rev. J. C. POLLARD, of Lancaster, seconded, and after a highly appreciative discussion the resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. NEWELL next submitted a draft of the proposed constitution to the meeting, which was considered. It was thereupon decided:—

That the name of the Union shall be "The North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association." That its objects shall be to unite in association the churches and Sunday-schools of North Lancashire and Westmorland for the purposes of holding conferences, public meetings, country excursions, circulating literature, and promoting such efforts as shall extend the influence and increase the usefulness of those churches and Sunday-schools; that the committee shall consist of president, treasurer, secretary (elected annually at each annual meeting), and one delegate from each congregation and Sunday-school affiliated with the Association; that the annual business meeting shall be held in Preston on the last Saturday in October, and that three conferences shall be held at other places in the Association during each year.

The other portions of the scheme related to financial and other matters of detail.

The officers for the first year were appointed as follows:—President, the Rev. H. V. Mills (Kendal); Treasurer, Mr. Fred Chadderton (Preston); Secretary, Mr. R. Newell (Preston).

After hearty votes of thanks to the friends at Preston for their reception and entertainment of the delegates, and to the Rev. N. Anderton for presiding, one of the most successful meetings ever held in the district was brought to a close.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SOUTH WALES.

THE all-absorbing question with many of us in South Wales at present is our New Century Fund. When we see our neighbouring friends of the orthodox folds working with such a will and with such evident success, we cannot but envy them, and pray for strength to overcome that inertia which is so characteristic of the ordinary Welsh Unitarian. But the reader must please note that we are also waking-up gradually, and some of our churches are doing well. In point of number our list of subscriptions will look respectable, though the total amount cannot help being petty in comparison. Other churches will count their hundreds of thousands; we can follow them—only at a great distance. We aim at a minimum sum of £3,000, and we have been told the sum is a modest one; but great as our need, and modest as our aim is, we cannot hope to raise even the £3,000 without much outside help. Our churches in South Wales are not numerous, and none of them are strong; the members do not belong to the richer class; the great majority, 95 per cent., are ordinary working-men. Still we claim that we have done good work in the past; our church buildings have nearly all been renewed within the last forty years; and I believe I can say with truth that two-thirds at least of the total expenditure were collected locally; and better still, our ministers' stipends within the same period, though small enough in all conscience even now, have been increased threefold. Considering these facts and remembering that as Hercules even in Pagan times is said to have helped those who helped themselves, we, in this twentieth century of the Christian era have drawn out our "Appeal" (copies of which may be obtained from the Rev. D. J. Williams, 3, Brynteg-terrace, Merthyr Tydvil), in the full assurance that the unfailing generosity and kindness of the Unitarian public will not fail us in this our time of need. With £3,000 we could bring light into the eyes and joy into the hearts of hundreds of our people.

The debts on a few of our churches—notably Pentre and Clydach Vale in the Rhondda Valley—are a veritable nightmare, crushing the spirits of the faithful few, and deterring the weaker ones from putting in an appearance at all, from fear of incurring a greater responsibility than they care to bear. The natural consequence is, the church suffers, the minister suffers, we all pity, and we all say we must try to relieve those good people of a part of their burden. The reader will probably remember that both these churches are new ones, gathered together a few years ago by Dr. Griffiths, then the missionary of the B. and F.U.A. in South Wales. They met originally at one of the Board-schools, but could not be allowed permanently to settle there. Then becoming homeless they had the courage of their convictions; and even though they should be blamed they would build, and build they did, two small Bethels for themselves and their children, incurring thereby an expenditure far beyond their expectation and beyond their means. They may not have exercised sufficient prudence, but I cannot blame them; if they erred, they erred in the direction of a good work, and they deserve all the sympathy and help we can give them to sweep off their debt.

The collapse of the chapel at Lampeter has placed our good people there in a most unfortunate predicament. The church only dates from 1876. It is situated almost under the shadow of St. David's College, and in a town which is churchy to an extreme, but it has always held its own well, and has become one of our strongest churches in Cardiganshire. No church of ours in Wales has made greater sacrifices. Its first building was erected in 1875-6, and soon paid for. Since then a house for the caretaker has been erected, and a hall for Sunday-school use and week-night meetings. Both these have been paid for. The Sunday services are held in the hall now; but it is utterly inadequate for the purpose—too small and too inconvenient. And now that the necessity for rebuilding comes upon the congregation, there are divided counsels, and the friends are naturally despondent. The more cautious are afraid of the expense, and keep asking where is the money to come from? They would be satisfied with any kind of four walls that would afford a sufficient shelter. Others maintain there is something due to public sentiment; they would have the new in no way inferior to the old, and in all respects worthy of a university town and of the importance of the congregation.

It is a fact, sad to contemplate, that no fewer than eight of our pulpits are at present vacant, with no hope of being filled this side of June, if then. The Rev. David Evans has taken charge of the pulpit at Cwmbach, and is doing good work there, but he has left that of Wick vacant. The Rev. W. J. Phillips has undertaken the somewhat difficult task of finding supplies for that pulpit. The Rev. David Rees has withdrawn his resignation, to the great joy of the churches at Pentre and Clydach Vale.

The friends at Merthyr Tydvil will have a red-letter day on Sunday and Monday, Dec. 1 and 2: the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., will preach anniversary sermons on the Sunday; and on Monday the foundation-stone of their new building will be laid, to be followed in the evening by a public meeting. It is to be hoped a history of this church will be given some day. It will be a long history, reaching beyond 1620, and a most entertaining history. It was for preaching to Nonconformists at Merthyr, and at the instigation of the Rector of Merthyr, that Vavasor Powell was haled to prison for the last time.

The pulpit exchanges in Cardiganshire continue to be as popular as ever. They take place in the summer. For seven consecutive Sundays each respective minister is absent from his own pulpit, which is supplied Sunday after Sunday by a succession of brother ministers. The congregations take a great interest in these exchanges, and are doubtless benefited by them; and the ministers ought to be benefited somewhat, as the arrangement leaves them more leisure for fresh study.

The Ymofynydd (our Welsh Inquirer) seems once more to have taken a new lease of life. It was taken up at the beginning of the year by the South Wales Unitarian Association, which has thus become in a way responsible for its management. It has two editors, both active and enthusiastic young men, who are fortunate in securing contributions from quarters where nothing was ever got before. Owing to the limited number of contributors, former editors were often at a loss for material to cover their pages. They often failed in variety, and sometimes erred in making their articles too long. It is to be hoped the present management will not err on the other extreme and let their magazine drift into the region of tit-bits. As they gain in experience, may they gain also in the knowledge and the wisdom which will make the Ymofynydd better year by year.

The second part of the "Gwersi ar Efengyl Luc" has just made its appearance. The first part we noticed last year, recommending it strongly to the notice of our readers. The present part contains lessons on Luke ix.-xvi., and is intended for the use of our Welsh Sunday-schools, from October, 1901, to May, 1902, when the general examination takes place. This part, like the first, is edited by the Rev. W. James, who also writes eight out of the twenty lessons, the other lessons being prepared by some ten or more collaborators. None of the writers seem to be afraid of the results of the Higher Criticism, and some may think that the writers do not err on the side of too much caution; but, whatever may be thought, they have made it clear that their aim has been to teach truth and not dogma. We hope this little volume will have a ready sale.

"The Free Church Council" is dealing with us in South Wales much as it has done with most of the Unitarian churches elsewhere, evidently taking their cue from headquarters. At Dowlais the then minister, the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, was invited to the preliminary meetings, but was ousted later on by a special orthodox resolution that could be called Christian only by courtesy. In the Rhondda Valley the Rev. David Rees was ignored, and he wrote a long and a strong letter to the local paper protesting against the injustice of the whole thing. And now the same is done at Aberdare, where our minister, when asked by an Orthodox brother minister why it was he was absent, could only reply that he was absent because he knew nothing about it, not having received any notice. Thinking that there might be others who would like to know the why, he sent his explanation to the Merthyr Express, claiming that his church was free as any in the valley, and, in a further letter, pointed out that the Unitarian pulpit was not only free but Evangelical—Evangelical in the sense that Jesus would have it to be.

Wales may be orthodox as Scotland is, but it has never been without the Black Drop in its veins since Pelagius preached the heresy that even "unbaptised" babies may get to heaven. We cannot boast of anything like "Scotch Sermons, 1880," but we fancy we see the occasional swallow that proclaims the advent of summer, the summer of a more rational and more humane theology. An M.A. and B.D. a few weeks ago said at Merthyr that John Calvin needed a more modern dress. Had John Calvin lived to-day he would have ound his dress a misfit. The Rev. P. T. Forsyth, following, wanted to know what particular part of John Calvin's dress needed altering. Froude was not the man to do the tailoring for John Calvin, as he had never been able to take his correct measurement. In to-day's (Nov. 15) South Wales Daily News I read: "Gwili, the crowned bard of the Merthyr Eisteddfod, believes that the higher criticism has made the Old Testament a New Testament to scores of earnest students." A young minister read a paper at Llandrindod lately on "The Bible and the Young People," which was to have been followed by a discussion. Instead of provoking a discussion, however, the paper froze the tongues of the prophets present, and one actually got up and walked out.

The Geninen for November, a Welsh quarterly, has two important papers, one dealing with the Bible from the higher criticism standpoint; the other dealing with Quakerism from the old standpoint, the latter from a professor at one of the Welsh colleges, the other from an Oxford B.A. and a Mansfield College student. The Geninen will admit an heretical article provided it comes from a quarter reputedly orthodox—not otherwise. The late President of the Calvinistic Methodist Association spoke some wise words a few weeks ago on giving up the chair. He deprecated the tendency to assume the rôle of defenders of the Christian faith. Truth needed no defenders, but simply expounders and preachers. The Church had suffered in the past owing to its foolish opposition to science. Let it therefore take warning. If evolution and the teachings of the higher criticism are true, no amount of fighting will avail against them. Mr. James advocated a strong pulpit, which could only be obtained by a well-trained ministry.

R. J. JONES.

Nov. 15.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

London: Kentish Town.—The Rev. Alexander Farquharson, after over six years' arduous ministry, and having recently completed the Church Ground Rent Endowment Fund, has resigned the pulpit of the Clarence-road Church. At a congregational meeting held on Friday week, a resolution was unanimously passed expressing the deep regret of the members, and appointing a deputation to wait on Mr. Farquharson to express their hearty appreciation of his services, and to earnestly request him to withdraw his resignation, and remain minister of the church.

London: Stratford.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, Nov. 10, conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. The evening service was fairly well attended. On Monday, Nov. 11, the annual Church Social Meeting was held. The chair was taken by Mr. John Harrison, President of the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, supported by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards and others. The Committee's report was read. The congregation had kept together fairly well, considering that they had had no settled minister for eleven years, although they could not be too grateful for the help given them by Mr. Edwards under the auspices of the Provincial Assembly. The church had sustained great loss during the year by the removal of its secretary, Mr. W. J. Hawkins, and others from the neighbourhood. But their buildings were practically free from debt, and there were a good number of young people connected with the church. With earnestness and zeal there was no reason why they should not go forward. Mr. Harrison, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke of the pleasure the Provincial Assembly felt in helping the church, and Mr. Edwards spoke encouragingly of the work being carried on.

London: Wandsworth.—The eighteenth anniversary of the Sunday-school was celebrated last Sunday by a special afternoon service in the church, conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, an address to the children being given by Miss Marian

Pritchard. A number of old scholars and other friends of the school were also present. Anniversary hymns and anthems were sung. At the conclusion of the service a card was given to each of the children, with an illuminated text on one side and on the other: "Wandsworth Unitarian Sunday School. Eighteenth Anniversary. Nov. 17, 1901. Remembering without ceasing. 1 Thess. i. 3."

Manchester: Bradford.—The annual congregational meeting of the Mill-street Free Church was held on Saturday, Oct. 26. The report showed steady progress, and the balance-sheet showed that the congregation had fulfilled their responsibility in the matter of purely local expenses. A small contribution was voted to the District Association. On Saturday last, Nov. 16, Mr. John Harwood gave a recital, which included selections from Shakespeare, Dickens, &c., and was thoroughly enjoyed. In spite of dense fog, the audience numbered nearly 150.

Mossley.—The annual Sale of Work, which was opened by Mrs. Dowson, of Gee Cross, with an interesting address, took place on Saturday afternoon last. The receipts amounted to £114 1s. 8½d.

Newchurch.—Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave a dramatic recital in connection with the Literary and Debating Society on Wednesday week to a large and appreciative audience, presided over by the Mayor of the borough. The reciter, by some apparently magnetic influence, held his audience entranced from start to finish, and the whole entertainment was very warmly appreciated. The programme included scenes from Shakespeare, Dickens, and others, the latter part, which was of a humorous character, including a sketch by Ben Brierley in the vernacular. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Harwood.

North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting was held at Trafalgar-street School, Burnley, on Saturday, Nov. 9. After tea, in the absence of the President (Rev. A. W. Fox), the chair was taken by Mr. N. Ingham. Mr. C. C. Grundy, of Blackpool, and Mr. A. W. Wadsworth, of Halifax, were present as representing the Manchester District Sunday School Association and the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union. The report and balance-sheet were presented, and the officers for the ensuing year elected. Speeches were delivered by the delegates named. Mr. J. S. Mackie, Mr. S. Holden, the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, and others. A well-attended meeting was closed with hymn and Benediction. Mr. T. Kenyon, Newchurch, is the President for 1901-2.

Nottingham.—The High Pavement Historical Society held an exhibition of antiquities, portraits, pictures, engravings, and other objects of interest associated with the history of the chapel on Thursday and Friday, Nov. 14 and 15, in the schoolroom. Much interest was attached to this exhibition, as it was the first of the kind held in connection with the chapel, and through the kind co-operation of the members of the congregation and other friends a large number of valuable articles were on view. Thanks are particularly due to the Corporation of Nottingham, to the deacons of the Castle Gate (Independent) congregation, to the Committee of the Nottingham Mechanics' Institution, to the Rev. Alexander Gordon, and to former ministers of the High Pavement congregation for valuable contributions. The exhibition was opened by the President (Mr. J. C. Warren), who in the course of a short address, said that it was particularly appropriate that the exhibition should be held this year, for it was exactly 250 years since there was first a gathered Presbyterian congregation in Nottingham by the settlement at St. Mary's of the Rev. John Whitlock and the Rev. William Reynolds. They were members of no mean congregation, for they had a history of very great interest, and could point to a long line of men and women who had taken a leading part in the affairs of the town, and indeed of the country. A sense of pride was of no avail, however, unless it inspired them to try to live up to the standard of their ancestors, and it was that feeling that to some extent had helped the Historical Society to make such progress. They had records in their old minute-book showing that the Presbyterian Classis commenced in 1656, and though there was a hiatus in their exact records from that time until 1691, when a chapel was built upon the present site, they had details furnished by "The Life of the Rev. William Reynolds," written by the Rev. John Whitlock. From 1691 to 1730 their old minute-book furnished particulars relating to the congregation, which were amplified by their registers, and from 1730 to 1760 there were similar records in an old volume which had been recently unearthed from the vaults at Somerset House, by Mr. G. Eyre Evans. From 1777 onwards their minute-books and other records were very complete. He hoped that someone would write a history of the High Pavement as it ought to be written, for there was a great deal of material of extreme interest which ought to be put into permanent form. Referring to the importance of the congregation from the first, Mr. Warren stated that the Earls of Meath and Clare, and other leading families in the town, were members of it in old days, and ever since prominent citizens had been associated with it. The two first trustees of the chapel were the Mayors of Nottingham in 1691 and 1692 respectively, and another trustee was Mayor four times. Out of the first twenty-two lay trustees in the first sixty years of their history, eleven filled the Civic chair, and from 1690 to 1800, members of the congregation occupied the same position for between seventy and eighty years. The Town Clerkship were entirely in the hands of the congregation from the time of Robert Seagrave in 1743 to the retirement of Mr. William Enfield in 1870. In 1691, doubtless, the congregation was composed of Trinitarians, and they had passed through Arianism down to the Unitarianism of to-day, but throughout the whole period their pursuit of truth had been absolutely free from Credal fetter. As early as 1737 the High Pavement had changed from Trinitarianism to Arianism. Up to that time the Pavement and Castle Gate congregations were closely associated, but in 1737 Mr. Joseph Rawson was excommunicated from Castle Gate on account of his being unsound on the doctrine of the Trinity, and he subsequently came to High Pavement. Since then they had broadened out into Unitarianism, and the Rev. James Tayler, at the commencement of the last century, was the first of their ministers to actually style himself and his teaching Unitarian. All these were matters of historical interest, and the Society, by the researches they were making, hoped to do still more to elucidate the history of the congregation. On Thursday evening a conversazione was held, when the whole of the objects were on view, and a short musical programme was given. During the exhibition the Society had the pleasure of welcoming among others the Rev. Frank K. Freeston (London), the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A. (Mansfield), the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, Ph.D. (Ilkeston), the Rev. J. Kertain Smith (Belper), Mr. G. H. Wallis, F.S.A. (Curator of the Nottingham Castle Museum), and several members of the Council of the Notts Archæological Society.

Pudsey.—The new schools were opened last Saturday, and a correspondent has sent us the following impression of the proceedings:—"I went, witnessed all the proceedings, rejoiced to behold so much harmonious enthusiasm, and felt how grand it would be if such a state of things could be chronicled in the columns of THE INQUIRER more frequently than is the case at present. Mr. Ward, J.P., after devotional exercises taken part in very reverently and heartily by a large crowd of persons, gave utterance to words of encouragement to the pastor and congregation of the church. A largely-attended and truly impressive service was afterwards held in the church, and the preacher of the dedication sermon was the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds. Such a discourse! The very thing—aye, the very words—necessary to uplift and chain a persevering and self-sacrificing people such as we have at Pudsey. It was practical and very appropriate in every sense of the word. At the evening meeting all the speeches were bright and encouraging, especially those by the Chairman, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., and Mr. Marshall (eighty years of age). If similar enthusiasm were displayed wherever meetings are held, greater success and better lives would be the result.

Sale.—The November calendar bears on its front a picture of the church in Atkinson-road, and in a series of notes on various topics, bears witness to vigorous activity. It records a pleasant meeting held in the Sale Free Library on Oct. 16, when a warm welcome was given to the Rev. W. L. and Mrs. Schroeder, the Revs. Dendy Agate and A. Gordon taking part in the proceedings. At the opening meeting of the Social Guild on Oct. 9, Mr. Schroeder gave an address on "Our Work and Aims," dwelling upon the old guild idea of mutual service, and pointed out how members might gather information as to the condition of the township, and so be of service to the governing body. In a personal note addressed to his congregation, Mr. Schroeder says:—"We can honestly say we are not behind in the work of making known the results of modern scholarship and criticism; but sometimes, I think, our churches content ourselves with that department of progressive work. Can we not strive to realise an ideal of closer union between church and people, or as I would prefer to say, between religion and life? As in Mediæval days, the church should be intimately associated with every phase of national, civic, and individual life; the gathering together on Sundays, for Divine worship, should be the supreme expression of an intensely real corporate life."

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—A re-union gathering of old and present members of the chapel and Sunday-school was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday, Nov. 12. About 100 sat down to tea, and there would be over 200 present when the entertainment for the evening was commenced. Mr. W. R. Stevenson gave selections on the organ in the chapel. Short speeches were made during the evening by the minister (the Rev. John Ellis), the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, of Upper Chapel; Messrs. W. Guest, W. Sinclair, R. Handley, H. Widdowson, and H. Smith, these being interspersed by songs and quartettes. The Rev. J. Ellis, in the course of his remarks, read letters from the Revs. C. Peach and G. Knight (previously ministers at Upperthorpe), who greatly regretted being unable to be present. Mr. W. Sinclair drew attention to the prosperous condition of all branches of the chapel, particularly the Young Peoples' Guild, from which additional members to the congregation kept coming.

South Cheshire Association.—The autumn meeting of the South Cheshire Association and Sunday School Union was held at Knutsford on Nov. 13, at which representatives were present from Chester, Crewe, Knutsford, and Shrewsbury. Mr. R. Mansell, Shrewsbury, presided, and at the close of the business meeting a Conference was held, at which the Rev. H. E. Haycock read a paper on "A Missionary Effort: Is it desirable and possible?" which provoked an interesting, and, it is to be hoped, profitable discussion. The reader favoured an attempt being made by the Association to establish Unitarian services in some town in the district that seemed to offer a fair chance of success, but the financial difficulty seemed to stand in the way. The Revs. G. A. Payne, R. S. Redfern, J. C. Street, Miss Thomas, and Messrs. R. Mansell, A. Orrett, and W. Tasker took part in the general discussion. After tea, in the schoolroom, a religious service was held in the chapel, when the Rev. J. C. Street preached an eloquent sermon, in which he spoke of the lessons an ancient building, such as that, brought home to them. It was a most helpful and uplifting service.

Stockport.—The Unitarian church in St. Petersgate was re-opened last Sunday after thorough renovation and redecoration. A new scheme of colour has been introduced, to which the new windows give a softened tone, and the effect is said to be highly satisfactory. The organ has been repaired, incandescent lamps have been substituted for the old lighting, and the ventilation has also been improved. The exterior stone-work has been attended to, and the schools have also been thoroughly cleaned and redecorated. The opening services, which were very largely attended, were conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, and the services were enriched by special music, including solos, sung with much feeling by Miss Bertha Guthrie of Manchester. Some very helpful passages from Mr. Hopps's morning sermon on "Why go to church?" we must reserve for quotation next week.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Monday, Nov. 18, the Rev. Charles Hargrove delivered a lecture on "Unitarian Beliefs and Disbeliefs." THE INQUIRER and Christian Life have been for some time sent to the Public Reading Room.

Wakefield.—The Westgate congregation, having lately received a considerable accession of new members and adherents, it was thought advisable to organise a large working party to promote social intercourse, and also to strengthen financially the leading activities of the Chapel and Sunday-school. This has proved a great source of pleasure and profit, for it has not only brought all concerned into closer touch, but has resulted in a handsome sum being realised for the various funds. On Thursday week the sale was opened by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., President of the Yorkshire Union. The Rev. Andrew Chalmers, who acted as chairman, said the enterprise had grown from a small beginning till it had almost reached the dignity of a bazaar. He had never in all his experience seen the ladies of a congregation work more heartily and harmoniously, nor did he ever remember Westgate Chapel in a more prosperous condition. Mr. Talbot's address was extremely interesting and helpful, and spoke of the principles that underlie all Unitarian work and worship, and insisted especially on truthfulness and fidelity in religious matters. He was pleased to find that all was going so energetically, and with such a united spirit in their church and its institutions, and in declaring the sale open, he wished them all success and satisfaction. A cordial vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. J. Dunnill, and seconded by Miss A. A. Walsh (the Sale of Work Secretary), brought the opening proceedings to an end. The sale was continued on the following evening, and at the close the amount obtained was found to be about £82, which exceeded the highest anticipations of its promoters.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

For the establishment of the National Conference Ministers' Superannuation Fund, the most strenuous efforts will be required to secure the last £2,000 still lacking towards the capital sum of £20,000. We trust that our churches throughout the country are fully aware of what is being done, and that there is no congregation in which some effort is not being made to secure either individual donations or a united contribution. It is earnestly hoped that the whole amount will be raised before the end of the present year. Next Wednesday evening a meeting is to be held in the Lewin's Mead Congregational Lecture Hall, Bristol, under the presidency of Mr. Philip J. Worsley, J.P., when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter is to urge the claims of the Fund, and on the following Thursday evening a similar meeting is announced at George's Meeting, Exeter, at 4 P.M.

The memorial tablet to the late C. L. Corkran, fittingly placed in the Mansford-street Church, Bethnal Green-road, as the successor of the Spicer-street Mission, with which Mr. Corkran was for so many years connected, is to be unveiled on Sunday evening, Dec. 8, by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The service is to begin at seven o'clock, and will afford a welcome opportunity for the gathering of many friends who cherish the memory of that devoted man, and may be kindled by such an occasion to fresh earnestness in the work to which he gave his life.

We should be glad to draw the attention of all friends of the London Domestic Mission to the advertisement in another column of the performance to be given at St. George's Hall next Thursday evening, through the kindness of Mr. J. H. Leigh, M.A., in aid of the funds of the Society. This is not the first time that Mr. Leigh, with the help of other friends, has generously provided a delightful entertainment for some such good purpose, and we trust that on Thursday evening there will not be a vacant place in the Hall. May we suggest to ministers, that they should remind their congregations of this occasion, and its purpose; and to other friends, that if they cannot themselves be there they might do a two-fold kindness by providing tickets for others, of whom there are very many, who seldom are able to enjoy such an evening's entertainment.

Our note of last week on the subject of the Concentration Camps in South Africa, referring to a memorial sent to Lord Salisbury, "signed by the minister and a considerable number of the worshippers at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead," has brought several letters from members of that congregation, disclaiming all sympathy with the memorial, which spoke of the terrible mortality caused by the condition of the camps as a reflection upon the Christianity and the honour of the Empire. We should have thought it quite clear from the terms of our reference that only those who signed the memorial had any responsibility in the matter, but our correspondents ask to have it distinctly stated that it was approved only by a section of the congregation, and that many members of the congregation would be much annoyed if the impression were given that they sympathised with the expressions contained in the memorial.

As regards the mortality in the Concentration Camps, one of our Hampstead correspondents is of opinion that the Government's Blue Book on the subject has put another face on the matter, and asks us to believe that "the death-rate of Boer children in their own homes before the war exceeded the mortality in the camps," and that "the death-rate of children in our own northern towns has been found, on careful medical comparisons, to be actually greater than in the camps in question taken on month to month records." These statements our correspondent makes in the interest of "truth," but does not substantiate them by any references or figures. Even in the worst slums of our northern cities has a mortality of 565 per 1,000 children under twelve years of age ever been recorded? That is the average given for the Transvaal camps in August. The figures, as to infant mortality, are not to the point in such a comparison. There is no doubt that uncleanly habits, ignorance, and obstinacy on the part of some of the Boer women is partly responsible for the appalling death-rate, but that is only another argument for breaking up the huge, insanitary camps.

During the visit of the Rev. R. Balmforth to this country the services at the Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Cape Town, of which he is minister, have been conducted by the Rev. D. Amos, who went out to take temporary charge of the church. We have received from Mr. Amos a letter telling of the cordial welcome he has received and of the prosperity of the church, and also a copy of the Cape Times of Oct. 19, reporting the thirty-fourth annual meeting of the church, held on the previous evening, with Mr. Amos in the chair. The report opened as follows :—

In presenting their report for the past year, the committee begs to congratulate the members on the continued progress and vitality of the church. The past year has been a most trying one, more trying, perhaps, for our church than for any other church in South Africa. The search for religious truth, and the desire for religious freedom, unhampered by theological dogma, is not confined to any one race, and it is, therefore, natural that a church like ours should embrace members of different races, who look with very different feelings on the great events which have occupied the minds and hearts of all. It is gratifying to know, however, that, in the main, the tolerant and large-minded spirit which our religion inculcates has borne the great strain which has been put upon it, and that, though our differences have been grave and deep, we believe that they have been largely, if not wholly, free from personal bitterness. It is essential that this spirit should be maintained both for the satisfaction of our own conscience, for the sake of the unity of the church, and in faithfulness to the great principles which we profess. We have pleasure in recording that a considerable number of refugees, both English and Dutch, have attended our services during the year. We trust that they will take back with them a clearer apprehension of our principles, and a determination to promote our cause in their several spheres of work. In this respect South Africa may be said to be a new country indeed, for the ignorance and misapprehension of our teachings, even in otherwise well-informed quarters, is almost appalling, and we need all the helpers we can get to "spread the light."

The report recorded the accession of eleven new members during the year, but pointed to a steady decline in the finances, due to losses through death, which had not been made up by new members. It was agreed to establish a Sustentation Fund to strengthen the position, £100 being taken from the church funds for the purpose, and another £100 from the Sunday-school funds, which were in a very prosperous state. To this two members offered each to add £25 if eight others would do the same. The Sunday-school was reported to be in an efficient state, and acknowledgment was also made of the services of the choir, and of the Literary Society, which had been fairly well attended during the winter. Reference was made to the International Council meetings in London, which had been attended by Mr. W. S. Woodhead, and to the importance of giving a wide circulation to the volume of the Proceedings. The adoption of the report was moved by Mr. Amos from the chair, seconded by Captain Jurisch, and adopted.

THE Rev. T. Witton Davies of the Baptist and University Colleges, Bangor, sends to the Christian World the following interesting letter which he received from Dr. Martineau. During the session 1878-9 Mr. Davies had attended Martineau's lectures on the "Grounds and Truths of Religion" in Manchester New College, and in the following year, having settled as Baptist minister at Merthyr Tydfil, wrote to ask for guidance in the prosecution of his studies. To this Martineau replied in the following letter:—

5, Gordon-street, London, W.C.
January 28, 1880.

Dear Sir,—I have not been able to turn my attention to the subject of your letter till this moment; and now I feel no little difficulty in complying with your request, from the scarcity of books—so far as known to me—which treat of the foundations of religion in at all a satisfactory way.

Especially on the question of Causation is it difficult to meet with any exposition in recent literature, which does more than reproduce the familiar Determinist cases with more or less ability on its own side, and misapprehension on the other. Mr. Hagard's (American) two volumes on "The Freedom of the Mind in Willing" and on "Causation" (Two Letters on) and Dr. G. W. Ward's "Defence of Free Will against Herbert Spencer" (reprinted from the Dublin Review) are the best exceptions with which I am acquainted. Dr. Ward's critique is very able both on this topic and on "Spencer's Psychology."

On the question of Final Causes, Paul Janet's treatise with that name is the best.

The whole question of Theism is, in no modern book, better treated than in Professor Flint's two volumes "Theism and Anti-Theistic Theories," the second being better even than the first. A different line of argument (that of Descartes) is followed by Dr. Hedge's (American) book, "Ways of the Spirit," and is admirably exhibited.

Of German writers on these subjects I can speak only within somewhat narrow limits. Some papers of Imm. Fichte I have from time to time read with interest, and they are systematised and published in a large volume on Theism, which as a whole I have not seen. But if you do not know Pfleiderer's recent "Religionsphilosophie auf geschichtliche Grundlage" you will find it well worth study. And, having mentioned his name, I am tempted to say a word also in praise of six lectures of his "zur religiöse Verständigung," which, though only popular addresses to a cultivated audience, and not exactly a student's material, are so lucid and vigorous in their treatment of great religious topics as to be very instructive and delightful reading.

This sketch is not what you asked for—a course of study. But it is the best I can give at present, and may, perhaps, supply a few months' reading.—I remain, dear Sir, yours very truly.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE APPEAL.

SIR,—It will probably save the officers of the Conference a great deal of correspondence if, instead of writing to them for some enlightenment, I send my letter to you, in the hope that they will communicate through your pages a reply which may be read by others as well as by myself. The appeal asks for £600 per annum to defray the travelling expenses of the Committee, the costs of the Triennial Meeting, and the salary of a permanent secretary, &c. To raise the money, it is suggested that the churches should contribute at the rate of sixpence for each subscribing member.

Although I think the honorary secretary should be relieved of any unreasonable burden of clerical work, and that the Churches, and not individuals, should be expected to provide the necessary funds for carrying on the work of the Conference, there must be something more in the minds of the Committee with regard to new developments than has been at present stated. My own folk, at least, will want to see a little further into the scheme. How in the world would a permanent secretary occupy his time exclusively with things within the sphere of the Conference? The work connected with the Ministers' Insurance, Students for our Ministry, and Guilds' Union would be best done by voluntary helpers with such paid clerical assistance as might be necessary. Think of all our District Associations and Provincial Assemblies and Colleges and Funds of one sort and another, whose secretaries are voluntary workers, proud to engage in such labour for the pure love of the cause. "Other questions are pressing on the Executive for attention," says the appeal. Surely we ought to be informed what they are; for it must not be denied that there is just a slight suspicion abroad that some members of the Conference Committee are anxious to relieve the British and Foreign Unitarian Association of certain branches of its work which many of us think it is doing uncommonly well. It must be recognised that in a district like Manchester we are being hard pressed for money all round. We are anxious to support our national institutions; but our own Association is asking for £400 a year additional income, and we have not so many wealthy men amongst us as we once had. Still we manage to rise to every occasion, and shall doubtless discharge our responsibility in connection with the National Conference, only we cannot help deprecating any unnecessary multiplication of paid offices; and I know that there are many like myself who think it would be a great mistake for the Conference to compete with the B. and F. in work which the latter Association is doing perfectly satisfactorily.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

SIR,—May I again be allowed to speak to the friends of Winifred House through the medium of your columns?

This Nursing Hospital Home for poor invalid children is happily so well known among our people now, that there is no necessity to go into detailed description of its aim and object. The steady work done for the last ten years and a half has been blessed with a full measure of success; and parents and friends of the children who have been sent to the Home make us feel very happy in our labours by their warm appreciation of the benefit which their little ones have derived during their stay. The number of beds in use during the last six months has beaten the record, the average being slightly under eighteen; while the improvement in health, helped by the long spell of summer weather, has been extremely satisfactory. But while the work has gone on well the financial condition is not so good as it should be, our Home having suffered in the national depression, in common with other institutions. Our list of donations for this past half-year is under £20; may we ask that this may be increased, for the exchequer is very low just now? But more especially would we plead with friends who are interested in the work, and who are not already subscribers, to give us their kindly help in this direction. It would be a great relief to the Committee if another £50 could be added to the annual subscription list; and we feel quite sure that this might be done if our many friends up and down the country realised that this amount is absolutely needed. That the Home is doing good work, and is worth supporting, is acknowledged, I think, by all who come in contact with it; and so I leave its claims to the consideration of your readers, believing that those who can help will do so—now that they know it requires this assistance—with that hearty goodwill and generosity which has always been one of the most delightful characteristics of the subscribers of this memorial Home of our old friend Mrs. Hampson.

LITERATURE.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.*

THIS book gives an account of the chief contributions to the problem of Theism made by English and American writers from the Reformation to the present day. In all, about ninety writers, or schools of writers, are examined. The author aims at showing what each of these has to say of the main basis of theistic belief. There is little or no criticism; the author has not even set forth the different and conflicting views in such a manner as to let them criticise one another; his purpose seems to be in the main "informational." The book is evidently the fruit of laborious and conscientious reading, and, if taken as a "First Sketch" of the history of Theism in England and America, we think it will be of real use. It will be of special service, too, in emphasising the fact that the problem of theistic belief may be approached from many different points of view, and along many different lines of thought. This obvious fact is too often overlooked. We find our thoughts on the great subject of Belief in God running most easily and naturally on some one line, and we work out of this all that it is worth; and we do well. But the result is sometimes a veritable "mental ossification," which makes it impossible for us to see how the same goal can be reached by any other path than our own.

Probably that aspect of the book which will be of most interest to our readers is the treatment of Unitarian writers. Beside occasional references, the author devotes brief sections to Theodore Parker, Morell, Priestley, and Francis Newman; and gives a very full account of the views of Dr. Martineau and Mr. Upton. His exposition of the first four of these is a failure. The account of Newman is little more than a caricature. Dr. Caldecott speaks of him as "an isolated mystic," "a recluse," "chiefly known to vegetarian propagandists." Newman's masterly exposition of the futility of reliance on external miracles, infallible persons or infallible books, must be appreciated before any discussion of his substitutes for them is possible. But with that exposure our author could have no sympathy.

Dr. Caldecott's treatment of Dr. Martineau and Mr. Upton is very different; of both writers he gives, within a moderate compass, a searching but sympathetic review, bringing out all the important points in their respective views as to the basis of Theistic belief. Before discussing this part of the book, we may quote a passage showing the author's attitude to what he not very happily calls "Intuitivism or Mysticism."

> Long dissatisfied with the usual treatment of Mysticism by English theologians and philosophers, I had worked to the position that it was justified in claiming a position as a sane and attractive method of Theism, provided discrimination be made between the forms which I have designated Exclusive and Comprehensive. By the failure to mark this difference, prejudice has been created, and confusion has prevailed. Hence I am free to enjoy all the satisfaction which arises from finding that Mr. Inge's extensive historical studies in this field [Bampton Lectures, 1899, on "Christian Mysticism"] have led him to a similar treatment. Perhaps the fact that the position of a specialist in this field coincides with that which has resulted from a study of the wider range of Natural Theology covered by the scheme attempted by the present writer, may be taken as giving some cumulative evidence that in the future this method of Theism is likely to engage more sympathetic attention in Great Britain—(p. 335).

We think that Dr. Caldecott has good ground for what he says here. By "Mysticism" he means, of course, the belief in God which consciously rests on direct experience; by "Exclusive Mysticism" he means such a view of the religious life as was taken by the Neo-Platonists, and afterwards by the early German mystics. "That way madness lies." "Comprehensive mysticism," on the other hand, holds that, though we have indeed an immediate and unique assurance of the Divine existence, it is given only that by it we may interpret and comprehend the ranges of ordinary life. Dr. Caldecott seems to regard it as essential even to "Comprehensive Mysticism" that the experience of God should be by some special faculty distinct from the ordinary experiences and powers of the spirit. If so we believe he is mistaken, and that there can be no such faculty. There may be—and we believe there is—an immediate apprehension of God as immanent in our Reason and our ethical and spiritual experiences and ideals. There is a Presence which meets us in the most momentous of our life's experiences, which pours into the fainting will the elixir of new life and strength, and into the wounded heart the balm of an infinite sympathy. This Divine Presence may be experienced at the very heart of our profoundest thought, in each act of resolute devotion to moral principle, and with special intensity in every act of self-surrender to the promptings of Humanity and Love. This is the permanent basis of religious belief, and this alone keeps it alive. Different forms of this view are found in the various writers and teachers to whom Dr. Caldecott refers under the head of "Mysticism": e.g., the Cambridge Platonists, William Law, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Maurice, Carlyle, Emerson, F. W. Newman, Bishop Westcott, G. J. Romanes [in "Thoughts on Religion," 1895], Mr. J. R. Illingworth, and Mr. Upton. There are distinct signs that religious thought is moving towards this position. And in recent philosophy, too, the range given to experience is being more and more extended beyond the region to which man's physical senses have access.

The author observes that a first impression of Dr. Martineau's method of Theism is, that the belief in a Divine Being is a result of demonstration,* in two ways—by the proof from Causation and the proof from Conscience:—

> These are both asserted and elaborated, and seem to give Dr. Martineau's whole account of Theism. God as Cause and God as Perfection is his own summary. I confess to having for some time taken him at his word. . . . But from two sources the impression grew that this was by no means a complete account of Martineau's true position; firstly in his other writings there seemed to be flowing a stream of ampler volume than could run within the banks of rationalism; and, secondly, the two treatises themselves contained so much of the extra-rational factor that it seemed incumbent on a seeker after Truth to unravel this factor and set it out in full light along with the others—(pp. 343, 344).

The clearest evidence for "the view that Dr. Martineau is really Intuitivist or Mystic as well as Rationalist," Dr. Caldecott finds in his treatment of Reverence as "the religious sense," giving us direct access to divine knowledge; but there are many passages besides, where the same position is implied. The present writer had already pointed out the significance of this part of Dr. Martineau's ethical theory, in an article published in THE INQUIRER more than eighteen months ago.

Dr. Caldecott considers that between Dr. Martineau's views and those expressed in Mr. Upton's "Hibbert Lectures" "there are differences of great importance":—

> Mr. Upton's method is different from Martineau's (1) in his taking ideal goodness rather than categorical obligation as the essence of morality, and (2) in that he does not proceed by inference to a Moral Lawgiver, but finds that our consciousness of moral worth is an immediate apprehension of the presence of the source of our ideals, who is in them manifesting Himself. . . . But a more important divergence from Martineau is in Mr. Upton's attitude to Intuitivism. Martineau really relies upon this, yet does not give it formal acknowledgment in his scheme; Mr. Upton brings it to the front in reality, though still endeavouring to withhold a full acknowledgment that he is doing so—(pp. 336, 337).

This last sentence hints at the difficulty which Dr. Caldecott finds in Mr. Upton's "Intuitivism." It is as follows:—

> He endeavours to dissociate himself from those who hold that religious belief depends upon a "special faculty," by claiming that it is in our Reason, in our Feeling, in our Conscience, that this sense of union with God arises. But it certainly seems that he is endeavouring to hold at once that our fundamental religious apprehension is direct and immediate, and at the same time that it is through manifestations—(p. 337).

This is precisely what we must hold; the truth, and the difficulty which it involves, could not be more admirably and pointedly stated. But to inquire further into this matter would lead us far afield. We have said enough to show that Dr. Caldecott has produced an able, candid, and useful book. We must add that he has understood "Theism" in no narrow sense; his review includes Berkeley, Hume, Mill, Spencer, and the "Religion of Humanity"; and several recent philosophical works, bearing on Theism, are intelligently summarised.

THE VICAR AND HIS FRIENDS.*

DR. CUNNINGHAM GEIKIE is well known as the author of a "Life of Christ" and several works on the Old and New Testament, in which he adopts some at least of the results of the higher criticism. His present work comprises a series of pleasant conversational essays—somewhat in the style of our old favourite, "Friends in Council," but confined to theological and philosophical questions, with an occasional infusion of popular science. The scene is the country Vicarage of Battiscombe, "the county town of the delightful region of soft hills and sweeping valleys that make up Downshire" (Devonshire?). The Vicar is a Broad Churchman, who is the friend of all his parishioners, both high and low, and thinks that "faith is proved by works more than by any parade of doctrine." In his preaching he abjures the pulpit dialect which has, he says, "the redeeming virtue with most parsons of being obscure, and on that account orthodox." Nature, he adds, is, "in its own province, as much a revelation of God, if we read it aright, as that which is expressed through human lips, and the lessons of the stars and of the rocks and the fields are no less traced by His finger than the tablets of Sinai." A scholarly and liberal-minded man, the Vicar naturally delights to meet with kindred spirits with whom he can talk over subjects of common interest. Battiscombe is represented as having a fair proportion of educated men, and these, together with some cultivated women and several of the neighbouring clergy, gather from time to time at the Vicarage to pass the evening in bright conversation.

In twenty sections that follow this pleasant Introduction, Dr. Geikie gives the results of a vast accumulation of miscellaneous reading and study of human life in various scenes and phases, the subjects being so diverse and interesting as "Science and Theology," "Heredity," "Evolution of Morals," "Ghosts"—not from the point of view of the Psychical Society—the "Reign of Law and Love," "Women's Rights and Duties," "The Bishops and Clergy," "Old Age," "The Christianity of the Future," "Immortality," "Love," "Marriage," &c. It would be convenient, by the way, if in a new edition the author would give a table of contents, or at least such headings to his chapters as those the present writer has affixed for his own reference. It can hardly be said that the characters have the dramatic interest of "Friends in Council," or that the conversations are invariably so bright and lively; but that book, published nearly fifty years ago, was one sui generis, and has never been surpassed, and Ellesmere and Milvertin are names that still linger in our memory. But among the Vicar's friends there are a doctor, a "parson Broadhead," a bachelor and a dear old lady, who are pleasant creations and have a fair amount of dramatic vraisemblance, and the book, small as it is, is full of apt quotations and scholarly illustrations which make it very interesting reading from beginning to end. Two or three passages will serve to show the liberal tone of these friendly conversations. From the sixth, which may be entitled "The Reign of Law and Love," we take the following:—

> The grand conception of God as the universal Father is pre-eminently a gift of Christ, for even the Jews regarded Him as only their Father, and the greatest minds of both East and West saw this highest truth but dimly.
> I take it we have to live heaven, not to seek it in Confessions or Articles, always looking as we go to Him who is the way, the truth, and the life.
> As to religion, who has not seen how the Calvinism of our childhood has lost ground; how our ideas of Inspiration have been changed; nay, how that growth of knowledge has modified our old views as to the sacred teaching respecting the age of the world and even of mankind, and how the text of Scripture has been illuminated by floods of new facts contributed by the patient criticism of scholars and the discoveries of the archæologist. Like the world itself, everything on it moves.

On the momentous question, "What will the Christianity of the Future be?" the Vicar says:—

> We may be sure that, however dead the formulæ may become which have been called Orthodoxy, they will never be entirely given up, though man-made theology will pass into practical oblivion.

The present writer is inclined to think so too, and holds that the age of arid controversial discussion—the pelting one another with texts—is passing away, and that the duty of all parties in the Christian world is to dwell on the central faith they have in common and the elements of truth underlying their respective creeds. We have admirable illustrations of this in Dr. Martineau's remarkable essay on "The Way out of the Trinitarian Controversy" and Dr. Freeman Clarke's "Truths and Errors of the Popular Orthodoxy," while, on the other side, we have many emphatic testimonies to the great service rendered by Unitarians in bringing to light essential truths obscured by the prevailing theology. Our author gives an explanation of the doctrine of the Trinity, which is simply the old Sabellian theory adopted by Archbishop Whately and his school. It does not, as he seems to think, quite solve all difficulties, and has happily been characterised as "Unitarianism in a mist." He commands our entire assent when he adds that "the attempt to define the undefinable is the source of much misconception in religion. "It is this meaningless jargon"—such words, for instance, as Trinity and Eternal Generation—"that befools us now as it befooled the Councils of Antiquity."

Enough has been said to show that this little book is one of considerable interest and value. The present writer retains his life-long conviction that our chief hope for the future is in a reconstructed and reformed National Church, which shall include various elements of religious thought and life. And if the broad and enlightened spirit of this writer were more prevalent throughout the country parishes of this land as it is now to a large extent in our great towns and in the Universities, the great historical Church of England would be established on an immovable foundation. SHORT NOTICES.

THE Rev. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh, has just published, through Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, London, a little book containing five expository discourses on The Christology of the New Testament, which is the title given to the book. His expositions of the more celebrated "proof texts" in the Trinitarian controversy are luminous and entirely candid, and it could do Unitarian propagandists nothing but good if they would study Mr. Drummond's statements and imitate his methods. He well says that the day of doctrinal disputation has waned—still more the day of text-battles. At the same time, and so long as the New Testament remains the manual of Christendom, it will be necessary to examine its contents with care, and, when they appear ambiguous or opposed to the conclusions of a thoughtful mind, to ascertain precisely, if possible, what the writer, be he "Paul" or "John," meant by them. It is in this direction that Mr. Drummond's book will be found most helpful, and the reader who has little time for more extended study will here gain distinct notions respecting the stages of Pauline and Johannine thought, which will solidly help him towards a better understanding of the whole New Testament literature. It need hardly be added that a tone of calm and intelligent piety pervades the book. (Price 1s. net.)

The Bible in School: A Question of Ethics, is the title of a vigorous treatise by Mr. J. Allanson Picton, who adheres to the conviction expressed by his vote on the School Board for London in 1871 that the Bible had better be kept out of school—at least for the present. Probably the majority of our readers will not agree with this opinion. They will wish that teachers should be themselves properly taught in colleges where theology and Biblical study are free from dogmatic fetters; and that such teachers should be allowed to use the Bible literature as they would any other source of noble and edifying thought. A good ideal Mr. Picton admits; but he thinks it may possibly be a practical proposal five centuries hence. Meanwhile the injustice to a thinking minority; the demoralisation of those very teachers who are most alive to the new light of criticism, but who must accommodate their lessons to the accepted standard; and, finally, the nugatory results upon the rising generation of the present and long-tried system; all these are presented by the author with copious illustration and characteristic trenchancy. Those sleepy Unitarians whom the voice of Dr. Crosskey—now alas! no longer heard—failed to rouse to a sense of the wrongs done in the name of "unsectarian religious education," may possibly be roused by Mr. Picton's appeal. They may not accept his policy, but they will therefore have more reason to be earnest for their own. (Watts and Co. Price 1s.)

The Quest of Golden Herb and Other Poems, by E. C. Gore, is a dainty little book in blue paper cover. Some of the shorter lyrics seem to us more successful than the longer poems; but the verses on "Furness Fells" are among the best—a keen sense of the beauty of Nature is blended with true human feeling. The book is dedicated "To those, the remembrance of whom, to me, is as a lasting fragrance," and there is a prevailing note of sorrowful and tender reminiscence, yet the opening verses of dedication have also a forward look:—

> This humble posy with its balms and rue
> Hath nought of value, save the gathering
> Held those fair thoughts I have always of you—
> My solace through the long day's wandering.
> But ere the skies grow pale and wanderers rest,
> Perchance more gracious flowers may bud and blow,
> If only you would aid me in their quest,
> For ah! my friend, Love's hedgerows blossom so!

As a good example of the author's work we may also quote the following sonnet, "Auf Wiedersehen":—

Rest, rest, dear Heart! for thee the day is o'er—
Steep fall the shadows on Life's purpling hill
Which thou, within the dawn, hast climbed, and still
The echo of thy step, yet evermore
The rhythm of thy life, in perfect score
Sounds in mine ear; its harmony doth fill
And flood the empty spaces drear and chill,
Thy leaving set within my heart's deep core.
My soul is songless, for Love's melody
To some—perchance not distant—strand hath fled
With thee, and thou a minor tone hast left
Within the pines, to haunt me fitfully
At morn, and noon, and dusk.—Yet by thee led
I follow, not of sweet Hope quite bereft.

The author of these verses, if we may judge from such phrases as "in perfect score" and the verses "To a Violin," is a musician as well as an idealist. (The Liverpool Booksellers' Co., 70, Lord-street, Liverpool. 1s. net.)

THE PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNALS.

THE International Journal of Ethics for October contains two or three thoughtful and also brilliant articles. It opens with two striking lectures which deal to some extent with the same subject, the first being on "The Use of Moral Ideas in Politics," by Professor J. S. Mackenzie; the other on "The Task of the Twentieth Century," by the late Professor Thomas Davidson, of America. The juxtaposition of these two able lectures is made the more interesting from the fact that the former is written by a pronounced and enthusiastic Hegelian; while the writer of the latter stoutly maintains that Hegelianism, "whatever its author and his disciples may say, sacrifices human individuality, human freedom, human immortality and even God; and is, in fact, only a framework of logical categories." In forecasting the various features of the task which lies before this new century, Professor Davidson finds a crying need for the forthcoming of a devoted brotherhood of apostolic souls; and he believes that ideas and impulses which will erelong embody themselves in a powerful regenerating movement are stirring in many minds. His hope and his prophecy have such close affinity with the conception of a new "Preaching Order," to which the Rev. L. P. Jacks, in his College address, gave such eloquent expression, that we think our readers will not be sorry to have the passage in extenso:—

The fiery enthusiasm for human worth, for the divine-human ideal, where do we find it? And yet that is what must be found ere the task of the twentieth century can begin. Somewhere there must be found a small devoted band of men and women of fearless character, clear philosophic insight, and mighty spiritual love, who, living a divine life in their relations to each other, shall labour, with all the strength that is in them, to lift their fellows into the same divine life. Forming a "settlement" in some city or town, they must preach, and teach, and toil, not merely among the poor and needy, but also, and perhaps chiefly, among the well-to-do, until they have impressed upon them the true ideal of life as struggle for spiritual worth—for insight and love and will—and conjured up before them the picture of the new heavens and the new earth, the scene of the ever-deepening intimacy of pure, free spirits. They must make their settlement the very centre of the city's life, its school, its college, its university, its church, its ethical society, and its theatre, all in one, all guided by the same lofty aim. They must endeavour to withdraw those that join them from the world that is, with its selfishness, its vanity, its love of show and of foolish, aimless amusement, and make them the first citizens of the world that is to come, with its friendship, its simplicity, and its active interest in all worthy things. They must interest themselves in social movements, and endeavour to give them a spiritual turn. They must establish an institution which shall do for the natural freedom - guided life of the future what the Church undertook for the authority - awed life of the past. And they will have much to learn from the Church, above all its discipline and its care for souls, adding thereto the care of bodies. Discipline is the backbone of every gospel that has any chance of success. All great religions—Buddhism, Judaism, Christianity, Islam—have been, above all, disciplines, institutions for training the affections and the will, as well as the intellect. There is no worthy religion that does not set its followers a great task, demanding self-abnegation and heroic endeavour. Through such task alone does man become aware of his divinity and blest in that awareness. And, after all, discipline is the nurse of freedom. We have to be trained to be free in any sense in which freedom has any value. When our little knot of men and women have fully established themselves in one city, have increased in numbers, and have learned by experience what regulations, forms, and activities are most conducive to their ends, they will send out bands of apostles to establish settlements in other cities, just as the mediæval monasteries did, until gradually the whole nation and, finally, the whole world, is leavened with the new spirit.

This is an inspiriting picture, a noble ideal! But the question at once suggests itself: Whence is to come the irresistible dynamic—the mighty faith and the consequent enthusiasm—which is needed first to construct, and then to move and to propel to glorious results, this projected machinery? In Professor Davidson's eloquent lecture, which was given before the Society for Ethical Culture, of Philadelphia, we cannot find mention of any adequate centre and source for this needed new-birth of spiritual energy; and it seems to us we must look for it not chiefly outside of existing churches, but rather in a fresh and profounder recognition of that actual self-revelation of Divinity in past and present Humanity which has hitherto furnished the motor principle for all the organisations which have been most mighty to liberate and to elevate mankind.

In turning to the October number of Mind we find ourselves in a much less exciting, but probably not less important, region of thought. Out of the four long articles in this number no fewer than three discuss the nature of Mental Activity or, in other words, theorise about the meaning and implication of the words "Attention" and "Effort." No question in philosophy has a more vital relation with Ethics and Religion than this. The point to be determined is whether Attention, and therefore Conation, can be explained without going beyond phenomenal psychology, or whether these experiences necessarily involve the activity and causality of a metaphysical Self. The present tendency in the philosophical world is to get rid, if possible, of all metaphysical causation and to find the explanation of all the facts of consciousness in precedent or attendant psychological states. Mr. Bradley's paper on "Conation," like some former articles by him in Mind, aims to show that what we call "Attention" means no more than this, that among the ideas brought up in succession by association some happen to be more interesting than others, and these we are said to attend to. The two remaining articles, while differing somewhat from Mr. Bradley and also from Dr. Stout in the analysis of the feeling of personal activity are at one with these psychologists in rejecting that activity of a metaphysical Self, for the reality of which other eminent psychologists, such as Professor James Ward, of Cambridge, and Professor William James, of Harvard, strenuously contend.

The writer of one of these papers in Mind, Mr. T. Loveday, makes what seems to us the very erroneous statement that, whether Professor Ward's alleged activity of the Subject is right or wrong, "it can have nothing to do with psychology nor psychology with it." Professor James takes a very different and, as we think, a far sounder view; and we trust that Mind will soon have the other side of the question explained and defended, and, if possible, by either the eminent Cambridge, or the equally eminent Harvard, advocate of metaphysical activity and causality. It is evident the philosophical controversy about Free-will mainly turns upon the settlement of this most important question.

The Philosophical Review for September and November well maintains its deservedly high reputation. In the earlier number the paper of most interest is an able criticism of Professor Ward's Gifford Lectures by Mr. Charles S. Myers, while the November number contains an excellent article by Professor G. S. Fullerton on "The Real World in Space and Time," and a valuable contribution to ethical thought in a very interesting paper by Mr. H. W. Wright on "The Truth in Ascetic Theories of Morality." Among the very ably-written Summaries of important articles in other philosophical journals we are glad to see a full résumé of Dr. Mellone's important paper on "The Nature of Self-Knowledge," which we inadequately noticed in connection with the July number of Mind.

MAN IN THE LIGHT OF EVOLUTION.

BY THE REV. J. T. SUNDERLAND, M.A.*

EVOLUTION shows us man standing at the head of all that portion of the creation of God of which we have any knowledge. The evolutionary process has travelled a long road from its beginning in fire-mist to what we see on earth to-day. But the process has been an ascent, and the culmination is man. From the inanimate to the animate, from lower forms of life to higher, from brute to man—that has been the order. Thus man stands at the summit of creation—its crown and its goal. Henceforth mind is king, and man the being who can think and know and love wears a dignity second only to that of the Infinite Mind.

It is not given us to know in how many worlds the evolutionary process has reached the same height that it has reached here; but if anywhere it has, then it has certainly produced the spiritual counterpart and brother of man—I mean some being who can know and understand as man can; some intelligence able to think God's thoughts after Him, as man is able; some being, the crown and consummation of the evolutionary process in that other world, as man is in this; and therefore, some being who, in some true sense, is God's image and child there, as man is here. Thus it seems to be no extravagance to say that the whole evolutionary process in the universe, from the first movement of primordial matter until this hour, has been one long travailing in pain of the universe to produce man or his equivalent—an intelligent spirit, a child of the Eternal Reason and Love.

* From a sermon preached in the First Unitarian Church of Toronto, Canada, and printed in the Toronto Sunday World of Sept. 6.

How nobly does this high view of man, which evolution has given us, contrast with the old low view of man, as a "fallen," "ruined" and "totally "depraved" being, "dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body," and "under God's wrath and curse, and so liable to all the miseries in this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell forever!"

In view of evolution and the splendid revelations of modern science, Emerson exclaims, "O, rich and various man! thou palace of sight and sound, carrying in thy senses the morning and the night and the unfathomable galaxy; in thy brain the geometry of the City of God; in thy heart, the power of love and the realms of right and wrong. An individual man is a fruit which it cost all the foregoing ages to form and to ripen. . . . A cultivated man, wise to know and bold to perform, is the end to which nature works, and the education of the will is the flowering and result of all geology and all astronomy."

Unreflecting men talk lightly about worlds and suns and stars overshadowing and belittling humanity. But can matter overshadow thought? Can the lower belittle the higher? Can fire-mist, or earth, or rock, or any material thing, no matter how vast its bulk, overshadow spirit, or eclipse the glory of minds that can think and know and will and love?

No! The universe is God's palace; and a palace of marvellous splendour it is. But man is God's child; and is not a child more than any palace, even if that palace be so vast that it stretches from the Great Bear of the northern heavens to the Southern Cross, and so glorious that the Milky Way roofs it, and Sirius, Aldebaran and a million other blazing suns are the lamps that give it light?

Going out under the sky at night, with no one near to break the silence, and looking up into the glorious and illimitable heavens, man may well believe that he can hear a voice speaking down from the Eternal Throne, saying, "O, my child, whom I have made only a little lower than myself, thou art more to me than all else. Before sun or stars were, I loved thee. Even whilst thou wert yet cradled in the far-off fire-mists, I watched over thee. Our destinies are one. Nothing shall ever pluck thee out of my hand of strength; nothing shall ever separate thee from my love and care."

OBITUARY.

MRS. JOSEPH LUPTON.

THE house known as The Elms, Chapel Allerton, Leeds, for more than sixty years past a Unitarian home to which ministers were always welcome, and endeared to more than one now residing at distant towns as the house at which they had their first experience of a genuine Yorkshire welcome, has lost its last mistress, and will, we presume, soon be pulled down. Mrs. Joseph Lupton will be best known to outsiders as the widow of one whose zeal and generosity and devotion won for him the respect of all those who shared his faith, and the affection of those who knew him best. But at Mill Hill Chapel she had claims to recognition on her own account, which we all readily acknowledge. For one thing, she was the oldest member of the congregation; she was christened by Dr. Hutton in the first year of his ministry, and she lived to see four ministers depart one after another, and four welcomed to replace them. There was no one of the congregation who had worshipped there so long; no one could have been more regular in attendance, or more attentive as a hearer; she seemed to have no partialities for one minister or another, never complained of any as being long or dull, listened to the preacher whoever he might be, and found her own good in his discourse. From the time she was first brought to chapel as a little girl to Nov. 10 last, when she attended in apparently good health and vigour, there passed some eighty years, and it may safely be said that all that time she never failed at Sunday morning's worship unless necessity or duty kept her away. Nor was her devotion limited to Sunday; she took an active interest in everything connected with the congregation, of which her parents, her brothers and sister, and her husband were devoted members, and in which she has left her only son and her grandchildren to represent her. Day-schools and Sunday-schools, Missions and Societies and meetings, all had a share of her attention and support. It was on Oct. 15, 1818, that the minister of Mill Hill Chapel christened her as the infant daughter of Mr. Joseph Buckton; on Nov. 23 his fourth successor in the ministry buried her as the widow of Mr. Joseph Lupton. THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

THE funeral of the late Rev. S. Fletcher Williams took place at the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, on Saturday, Nov. 23. The service, which was held at noon, was largely attended by members of the congregation, to which Mr. Williams had ministered for five years before going to India, by representatives of various societies, including Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., President of the B. and F.U.A., Mr. John Harrison, President of the Provincial Assembly of London and South-Eastern Counties, and Mr. Ion Pritchard, hon. sec. of the Sunday School Association. Most of the London ministers were also present.

The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, after which an address was given by the Rev. James Harwood, and the service at the grave was taken by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, the present minister of the church.

In the course of his address, Mr. Harwood spoke of Mr. Williams as always strenuous and diligent in cultivating the gifts with which he was endowed, so that his outlook became wider and his influence extended, and he himself seemed to grow with the larger opportunities offered to him. Of his final work in India Mr. Harwood spoke as follows:—

"Perhaps the distinctive work by which Mr. Williams is now most widely known, and will be longest remembered, is that mission to India which occupied the closing years of his life, and for which he was so exceptionally fitted, alike by natural gift and acquired culture. His large power of acquiring information, coupled with his remarkable fluency of expression, could hardly have found a more congenial sphere for their exercise than India affords. As to the spirit in which he undertook this work, has he not himself told us that he went out 'with the determination to see those phases of thought and life with which I should come in contact, not from the European but from the Indian point of view; and to estimate them, not on the basis of what they might seem to be to a European Christian, but on the basis of what they are to an Asiatic Theist. As I wish Christianity to be judged by its best and not by its worst, by its purity and not by its adulteration, so I wished to judge of aspects of religion in India by their highest, not by their lowest, by their strength not their weakness, by their essence not their excrescences.' This characteristic attitude of sympathy and appreciation, which one would have thought was the first essential for a missionary, though alas! it has been so rarely displayed, at once gained for Mr. Williams ready access to men of various ways of thinking. His respect for them was reciprocated in the regard they felt for him. Something more indeed than intellectual force is needed to enable a man to combine the fervour of an apostle bearing a message which has possession of his heart with a true sympathy and consideration towards those who belong to other communities. Fineness of temper, spiritual tact, a large hope and a great love—these may succeed when all else fails.

"It had been hoped that when our friend had completed his work in the East he would have come back, fitted by his unique experience to guide our counsels in these matters at home. That hope is now disappointed, and great is our loss in consequence. Yet, even in this hour, we will be thankful, as our friend himself was thankful, for what has been accomplished. Every Englishman going to India in the spirit in which he went helps the East and the West to understand each other better, and to realise the relations in which both alike stand to the common Father of us all. And if ever that unity of mankind is to be established for which we pray—unity not so much of belief, but of faith and aspiration—it can only be through such efforts of good-will and sympathy as those which have recently been so fruitful."

In conclusion, Mr. Harwood referred to the widespread sympathy that would be felt, not only by those gathered round the grave, but in all the congregations to which Mr. Williams had ministered, and in the circle of his brother ministers. "And especially," he added, "would I include a host of our brethren in India, who had learned to love Mr. Williams for his work's sake in the first instance, and then for his own sake, and who will, assuredly, be touched with a new sense of the sacredness of that work, for which it is hardly too much to say that he lived and died."

At Newchurch, last Sunday, the scene of Mr. Williams's first pastorate, reference to his death was made by the Rev. J. J. Shaw, and to-morrow (Sunday) a special memorial service will be held.

At Chowbent Chapel the Rev. J. J. Wright paid a warm tribute to the memory of Mr. Williams, his friend and early tutor, the minister of his youth and early manhood, to whom he owed more than to any other man, for opening up to him all that is best in life.

At Stamford-street Chapel a memorial service was also held on Sunday morning, when the Rev. F. Allen preached from Rev. xiv. 13.

A contributor to the Hackney Gazette writes of Mr. Williams as follows :—

Few men were better known, and none more widely respected, than the cultured minister whose loss we mourn. Nor was his influence confined to the pulpit, or to his own denomination. He embodied in his personality all that was highest and best in the progressive forces of the day. The truest religion is that which touches humanity at every point, and this was Mr. Williams's creed, in the pulpit, on the platform, and in the Press. Broad-minded and tolerant, he was especially a force for good in our own immediate district, where his gift of eloquence was always at the service of any movement for the advancement of the people. Many will remember with pleasure his brilliant lectures on literature at the Hackney Town Hall, while his thoughtful discourses published from time to time in this journal proved a source of inspiration to all.

In the memorial notice which we published last week the date 1879 was given in mistake for 1876 as the beginning of Mr. Williams's co-editorship with Mr. Black of the Unitarian Herald, and it was at the close of 1885 that the two names appeared for the last time as joint editors on the front page of the Herald.

The Rev. T. L. Marshall, who was for so many years secretary of the Presbyterian Board, also sends us a note recalling the valuable services rendered by Mr. Williams as a member of that Board during his ministry at Hackney (when he also served on the Committee of the B. and F.U.A.), and particularly at the annual examinations at Carmarthen College. Of this Mr. Marshall writes :—

"Mr. Williams undertook the larger part of the theological, philosophical, and English literature subjects, and his examination papers were models of their kind for thoroughness and comprehensiveness. He was deeply interested in the College, and was a welcome visitor for at least four successive years. His addresses on speech days were carefully prepared and very able, and for many years past no visitor left a stronger impression both upon the professors and students by his urbanity and marked interest in the studies of the College. I was deeply indebted to him and to the Treasurer of the Board, the late Mr. W. C. Clennell, for their able assistance in carrying out a scheme for the practical reconstruction of the College as a purely theological institution."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I suppose everyone is settled at home for the winter now; holidays over long ago, and girls and boys at school or busy with lessons at home. I wonder where you spent your summer holidays, and what sort of places you saw. I want to tell you about one lovely place in Scotland. Well, there is a lake, with mountains round it, and great fir trees and delicate birches beside it on the shores, and heather which in August is a splendid sight with its bloom; then there is a little ruined castle on an island in the lake—the ruins almost overgrown with trees—and if you stand on the shore of the lake, and talk or sing or whistle, there is a wonderful echo from the castle walls which answers you back, and which children used to call "the old man in the castle." On the shores of the lake and beside the little road, great tall ferns stand graceful and beautiful under the trees, and little squirrels with light-coloured tails rush up and down the trees, and jump across from one to another. Nothing could be more tranquil and peaceful and beautiful than it was; there was nothing to spoil the beauty and peace. And on the top of the castle wall a pair of ospreys used year after year to repair a nest of sticks, and bring up two young ones; it was a pretty sight to watch the parent birds going off to fish, and then to see them teaching the little birds to fly.

But presently people began to find out this lovely place, and come over for picnics from places far and near. A lovely place to come to, indeed; and if they had only enjoyed it, one ought not to be sorry for them to come. But by degrees they began to do mischief; as they walked along by the lake some of them beat and hacked the lovely graceful bracken with sticks, and left them hanging in rags about the road and the banks; and as the carriages passed under the trees, the people laid hold of the boughs and tore them off, and flung them on to the road. The children threw stones at the squirrels, and screamed to each other across the loch; the men sang rude songs; and the shouting to the "old man in the castle" became so common and so noisy, that the beautiful ospreys deserted their nest, and retired to more quite places, and were seldom seen about the loch. Then when these visitors had their lunch, they left all their papers flying about in the wind, on the grass and heather and amongst the flowers, and on the road, and sticking in the bushes. Bottles and corks—broken or whole—were left on the ground; and orange and banana peels lay about wherever the picnics had been. Sometimes we tried to collect the unsightly rubbish, that it might not disfigure the beautiful place; but it was a sad change to those who had known it before. Often, as I went along by the lake, the thought came "The earth is the Lord's"; and that we are put upon it to love it and keep it beautiful, as He made it, not to disfigure it by our untidy ways.

Think how orderly God Himself is: how the dead leaves that fall to the ground enrich the soil, and make nourishment for the young things that grow up; nothing is wasted—everything is used.

There is one thing which always seems to give such a beautiful lesson, and that is the water-lilies that float on the ponds and look so lovely! Did you ever notice that you never see a dead or untidy water-lily to spoil the group on the water? When the flower begins to wither it is drawn down under the water and hidden from sight, not left to look unsightly. It carries its seed below, and drops it on the bottom of the pond, to grow up into young plants another season.

Untidy bottles and papers cannot put themselves out of sight like the fading water-lilies, so we must do it; and when we have our lunch or our picnics we must collect all that is unsightly, and pack it away in the baskets that brought it and take it home.

It is a real disgrace to see our streets now. Errand-boys turn out all that they do not want; people throw rubbish out of the windows; and I have seen a gentleman when he has done with his newspaper just drop the whole of it, open, at the corner of the street, to blow about under the horses' feet.

Now, dear children, won't you try and help to keep a "beautiful world," and do your part in honouring the lovely places where it is given us to enjoy our leisure? Though the streets are not, perhaps, beautiful, they are infinitely uglier if they are untidy and strewed with paper and rubbish, and we have no right to spoil beautiful places with our untidy ways; we owe a respect to the lovely country which has been given us to enjoy, and it is our duty to leave it as beautiful as we find it, and not to spoil it, either for other people or for the wild animals whose home it is. We shall not enjoy it one whit the less, but all the more, if we help to keep it as God made it.

So I hope that all of you who read this will remember not only when you have picnics, to carry away all your rubbish, but from day to day will make it a rule and a habit to do all you possibly can to keep things tidy and nice for yourselves and others; and if you like to tell your friends about the water-lilies, and about the ospreys that were driven away by rude noises, and about the untidy people who picnicked by the Scotch lake, so much the better.

Gertrude Martineau.

The Christian Register, of Nov. 14, says that "as the result of the International Council in London, various liberal organisations begin to send delegates to each other's meetings," and adds a note as to Mr. Armstrong's presence at the recent meeting of the Protestantenbond at Utrecht. But, happily, this is no new thing. For many years we have enjoyed this interchange of sympathy and hospitality between representatives of our Association and such liberal bodies as the Protestantenbond of Holland, the German Protestantenverein, and the Délégation Liberale of the French Protestant Churches.

The Rev. R. E. Birks, brother of the Rev. John Birks, of Derby, after a ministry of six years at Bernardston, Mass., has accepted a call to the old historic church of Deerfield, Mass., and entered on his duties there on the first Sunday of this month. His son, Mr. A. W. Birks, after graduating at Meadville Theological School, has been appointed to a "Williams Fellowship" at Harvard.

"A CONFESSION OF HERESY."

IT is some time since we read an "apologia" so much to the point, yet so carefully measured in thought and expression, as one which has just been published (Philip Green, 1s.) with the above title. The author is the Rev. T. J. HARDY, B.A., who till recently was a clergyman of the Established Church. His essay is a reproduction of what was modestly given in the first instance to his "Men's Discussion Class." It could be wished that a "Clergymen's Discussion Class," with a bishop in the chair, might take it as a subject for consideration. There is nothing in the essay—as it appears to us at least—that could hurt the feelings of any devout believer in orthodoxy; unless, indeed, truth uttered in gentleness is more troublesome than passion foaming into rhetoric. Mr. HARDY writes, it is clear, with a keen sense of what it means to dissever himself from the Church of his fathers, and the scene of his own past labours. He goes out, "like Abraham, not knowing whither"; for his is not the mind that easily transfers itself from one circle of activities to another. His religious convictions are strong; probably he was never so decidedly a Theist and a Christian as in the hour when he ceased to be a prisoner of creeds and articles; but where among the churches claiming to be free he will find a congenial field of work is still a question. As we read his pages, it is natural for us to recall the story of other Churchmen who, like STOPFORD BROOKE—an example evidently prominent in his view—have sooner or later found their only resting-place in the community of our own group of churches. Be that as it may ultimately prove; let us, if we may, offer the author a cordial recognition, and by way of a brief introduction to the fuller reading of an address which is well worthy to be widely circulated, indicate the chief thoughts which it presents.

In the first place, the author tells us, with irresistible evidence in support, that the internal state of the Established Church is deplorable for lack of order and discipline; and what is worse is the laissez faire policy whence this disorganisation results, and which is itself the symptom of a fatal lack "of intellectual seriousness," as MATTHEW ARNOLD called it. No doubt it is open to anyone of Mr. HARDY's former brethren to ask him on what lines he would have the guardians of discipline proceed. Whether they aim at the ultra-Protestantism of the Church Association, or at the sacerdotal Catholicism of the Church Union, they would inevitably provoke bitter discontent and open revolt. And such a brother might not unnaturally ask—it is asked—whether it is not better to endure the ills of the present rather chaotic time when, as men did in the days of the Judges (though not of the Ecclesiastical Courts), every man does practically what is right in his own eyes. Besides, there is a glamour of "breadth" and "tolerance" in a system which includes the present extremes; would it not be a pity to narrow the national church to any one ecclesiastical or doctrinal school?

The author does not, indeed, directly enter into this discussion. His essay, however, forestalls all such specious pleas by insisting, as surely a religious man is above all others bound to insist, on sincerity. What he complains of is the present liturgy and formularies in use; he has nothing to say about the Thirty-nine Articles; they have long since been "defecated," to use MARK PATTISON's phrase, till they are mere ghosts. He says, in effect, that whatever the intelligent clergyman may think, in common with the intelligent layman, respecting the universal order of our world, and the problems of the New Testament in particular, he is bound to go on using phrases which, if they mean anything, contradict the basal convictions of all cultivated thinkers. After observing—

> It is very difficult to say what criterion of orthodoxy it [i.e., the Church] possesses, and correspondingly easy to read one's own meaning into its formula without much compunction, he bids us

> Remember there are always the advantages of a ready-made organisation to counterbalance any occasional twinge of conscience. I took Orders, believing that I could in that way best give to others what I had myself received. But as time went on I learned to know the cost of the position so acquired, and to find out the truth of the words, "There is no honest delight in influence if it is only to be exerted in the sphere of secondary objects, and at the cost of objects that ought to be foremost." I found myself committed to a view and temper that never could be genuinely my own, and obliged to use a terminology always inadequate and often misleading. The situation began to tell on my work, for the worst evil of compromise is that against which its subject battles in vain—the arrest of progress and the undermining of principle. A parson's work, with its peculiar difficulties, demands perhaps more than any other the hearty concurrence of his own soul. Nothing so saps his energies like the haunting surmise that he is acting a part. Good as his intentions may be, he finds himself in a false position, and the mind that should be employed in soothing the sick and the troubled is no longer at rest itself.

Our readers will not miss the keynote of earnest simplicity that is dominant in these weighty sentences. But passing, as we are sure the author would wish, from all considerations personal to himself, we reach the gravest passage, perhaps, in the whole essay when we proceed to read:—

> A general position. Still, I knew that in this I was not alone, that there were plenty of men whose convictions coincided more or less nearly with my own, and who continued to use the Church's opportunities for usefulness. From time to time I met with quite a number of clergymen whose judgment was in suspense on the subject of miracles, especially the virgin birth of Christ and his resurrection, who had long ceased to hold that the Scriptures are inspired in any especial sense, and to whom the doctrine of the Trinity was an invention of metaphysics. Understand me, I am not for a moment calling in question the honesty of these men. I can judge of none but myself. But while assuming their entire honesty, I cannot blink the fact that the kind of attitude thus assumed would in other departments of life justify a large amount of falsehood and wrong.

We think Mr. HARDY will have the general assent of the laity with him in this conclusion, and that it is due to the known discrepancy between the exoteric and esoteric opinions of their religious guides that so many, especially of our younger Englishmen, are entirely alienated from active concern with religious culture and progress, either individual or social. "Absolute sincerity"—that is the first desideratum in religion, says the author; and it is in order to live in the light of perfect candour, cost what it may, that he at least has decided to be no more the dupe of the many pleas by which men are deceived into putting something else first, and truth second. His pages very concisely and aptly sum up the arguments that have led men to the modern conceptions of "Unity in the Universe," "Uniformity" in Nature's methods, and "Evolution"; and he shows in a striking way how these conceptions cut directly across the old theories and suppositions which lie at the roots of "orthodoxy." We promise much interest and profit to any reader whom our remarks and quotations may induce to get the little book for himself.

THE WISH FOR IMMORTALITY.

A CURIOUS and interesting series of questions has recently been issued by the American Psychical Society with a view to ascertaining how far and on what grounds there is a wish for immortality. This Society is inclined to believe that the wish is by no means so general as is usually supposed. At any rate they want to ascertain actual sentiments. They are not concerned with proofs real or imagined. Their aim is to find out how far immortality is desired, on what terms and why?

The following is the list of their questions:—

I.—Would you prefer (a) to live after "death" or not?

II.—(a) If I. (a), Do you desire a future life whatever the conditions might be?

(b) If not, what would have to be its character to make this prospect seem tolerable? Would you, e.g., be content with a life more or less like your present life?

(c) Can you say what elements in life (if any) are felt by you to call for its perpetuity?

III.—Can you state why you feel in this way as regards questions I. and II.?

IV.—Do you now feel the question of a future life to be of urgent importance to your mental comfort?

V.—Have your feelings on questions I., II., and IV. undergone change? If so, when and in what ways?

VI.—(a) Would you like to know for certain, about the future life; or (b) Would you prefer to leave it a matter of faith?

These questions are undoubtedly searching, clever, and well arranged upon the whole. We do not see a clear distinction between II. (c) What elements in life call for its perpetuity? and III. Why do you want another life? since the reasons for wishing to live after death are inextricably connected with the elements in life which call for its perpetuity. The division seems to us only valuable for those who reply to (c) in the negative.

The difficulty, indeed, with which these scientific inquiries will have to contend is that far more of those who disbelieve in immortality will be interested in these questions than of those who believe in it. They are likely to receive more answers from doubtful and pessimistic minds than from those who are at peace and whose faith is firm. Men who have even a glimpse of what belief in another life means may easily be indifferent to such scientific methods of inquiry or even be repelled by them. They require the elimination of emotion, whereas "there are some things which can only be known rightly under conditions of emotion," as Arnold Toynbee says. The belief that there is something in us and others that cannot die is based upon deep experiences with which emotions of sorrow, shame, love, and reverence are involved. Men who feel these emotions may doubt if much good will be effected by a statistical inquiry, and will probably not take the trouble to answer the questions. Another difficulty will be to distinguish answers which are the result of prejudice and convention, and therefore of little value, from those in which genuine natural sentiments are expressed.

> Though all things else should wear the brow of grace,
> Yet grace must still look so, said Shakespeare with profound truth. The man with intense feeling cannot say much more in short answers to an examination than the man who hardly feels at all but just answers as his mood or as his bias bids. The result of such an examination will therefore be, we think, that a disproportionate number of sceptics will reply to it, and that amongst the replies it will be impossible to distinguish the real sentiments for or against another life from merely conventional sentiments.

The most interesting part of the inquiry is contained for us in the first and second questions. Are there really many men who would not choose to have another life on almost any terms? We might shrink from a life of eternal suffering, although Milton evidently thought that even this would be preferable to extinction.

> For who would lose
> Tho' full of pain, this intellectual being?

The words are put into the mouth of Belial, but are dramatically unsuitable. They express the sturdy indomitable love of life which exists in all Puritanism.

But to desire another life on any better terms than this seems to us the natural condition of every healthy-minded man. It is not a question of belief or disbelief; a man may feel that there is no proof for another life, and yet he may earnestly wish that it were true. Professor Huxley, in a letter to John Morley, expresses what we take to be the healthy natural feeling of a good man. "It is a curious thing," he says, "that I find my dislike to the thought of extinction increasing as I get older and nearer the goal. It flashes across me at all sorts of times with a sort of horror that in 1900 I shall probably know no more of what is going on than I did in 1800. I had sooner be in hell a great deal, or, at any rate, in one of the upper circles where climate and company are not too trying. I wonder if you are plagued in this way." How it is possible for anyone who has ever really loved or experienced the delights of mental life to wish for extinction is, to us, incomprehensible. We can understand a man disbelieving in another life, we can understand him trying to stifle his regret and facing the inevitable with cheerful courage, but that he should really desire annihilation for himself and others seems to us a pitch of pessimism which is almost incredible. And yet the Society which has issued these questions, and especially Mr. Schiller who is their English representative, evidently expects that many will say that they do not desire another life. Mr. Schiller wrote an article a few months ago, asserting that, in his opinion, the desire for another life was very much exaggerated. A vast number of people do not care a straw about it, so he says, and very many decidedly prefer the idea of annihilation. The Committee of Inquirers suggest the same, and mention Buddhists as an illustration of their belief. We must not be led away into a discussion of what the Buddhist ideal of Nirvana means. It certainly means the desire to reach the end of a long series of lives on earth, and even so has something a little pusillanimous about it; but that it means utter extinction is not generally agreed. It is usually defined as absorption in the absolute, and whatever that is, it is conceived as something higher than the personal life on earth, not infinitely less than personal life as annihilation would be.

We must suppose, however, that Mr. Schiller and the Psychical Society have some grounds for their belief. If so, it is one of the most serious indictments against the conditions of modern life which could possibly be made. An age is not to be judged nearly so truly by its beliefs as by its hopes. Many causes go to break up old beliefs, many of them useful ones. Wider and more accurate knowledge, deeper experience, more fearless and unprejudiced inquiry may seem for a little time to destroy beliefs which had been based on the insecure foundation of Church or Bible. Neither a man nor an age is to be condemned because the conviction of immortality is lost. But it is a very different thing if the desire for continuation of life is also lost. That argues not only hatred and contempt for life, but impotence in all the higher faculties. There have been other ages when there was so much wretchedness and wrong that men have hated earthly life. But in such ages hope has often burnt all the more brightly in the darkness. Men have longed for light and sought for it; even if they had given up believing in it they still had enough life to wish for it. We have so much manliness left in us as to feel generally that a man who hates his life and ends it, is something of a coward. But this desire not only for the end of life on earth but the end of all possible life in heaven is a far more monstrous form of suicide. It means an intensity of hatred for every form of life which is utterly abnormal, and is a sign of serious disease. It means that men are so heart-sick, so weary, so bitter that they have not energy sufficient left to wish for something better. How far this pessimism extends we do not know; the inquiries of the Psychical Society may help us to find out. But so far as it exists it is a disgrace to civilisation. In some cases it is no doubt due to personal wrong-doing. In many others it is an unreal pose, which is the result of fashion and prejudice; in others it is simply lack of imagination; and in some, we are afraid, it is due to conditions of life which have not only taken away all interest from earthly existence, but have destroyed all desire for better things. Human invention has developed marvellously during the last century in its power to kill the body. In the creation of a desire for eternal death it has gained something like a power to kill the soul.

HENRY GOW.

NONCONFORMITY IN GUERNSEY.

IT may be said at the outset that Orthodox Dissent is strong in the Norman Isles. But it is only with Guernsey that this article deals. In this island the Congregational and Baptist churches are each represented by a chapel of fair size—in St. Peter Port, the capital of Guernsey, and by smaller ones in some of the country parishes. The services in the town chapels are conducted in English, but French is the language used in the country ones as a rule. There is only one Presbyterian church in the outskirts of the town, and a small Bible Christian chapel takes a good place amongst its sister communities.

Methodism, in its different forms, dominates over the other phases of Orthodox Dissent. There is a large Methodist New Connection chapel and a small Primitive, but Wesleyan Methodism is the strongest of all, and it is divided into an English-speaking and French-speaking circuit.

Each minister of the two large English chapels of St. Pierre Port has in his charge a small church just beyond the town, in various populated districts; and the pastor of the English chapel at St. Sampson's (the second town of Guernsey) has also a small outlying church under his care. This is an excellent and successful arrangement, affording scope for the brotherliness which is so special a characteristic of Methodism.

It seems clear to an unbiassed observer that French Methodism drives straight home to the heart of the island. There is about it an elemental simplicity which is largely in keeping with the stalwart independent spirit of the Guernsey people proper.

The mother chapel is situated at Saint Pierre Port, and its services are always held in French, and every country parish has its neat, granite French Methodist chapel, with a bright roomy interior. There are three ministers in charge, aided by a devoted band of local preachers, who walk many miles on Sundays through all weathers, to be at their posts on the hillsides or by the sea. Here and there may be seen little extra chapels, so to speak, in specially needy or wild districts. The wonderful organisation of Methodism is well adapted to meet the wants of people who, even in the island of Guernsey, are a mixture of well-to-do families and peasantry. I speak now entirely of the country parishes. There is a work found for everybody who desires it.

The chapels in the hilly west, known as the "higher parishes," are worked specially by the third minister who lives out there, in the far country, and has his hands full with preaching appointments and visiting. To come into close touch with French Methodists is to meet many an original, choice soul, who has weathered out years of hard work and trouble, but who ever "puts a cheerful courage on," and helps valiantly to maintain the cause.

It is in these hilly wild parishes that one feels the real meaning of the "gospel of experience" so dear to old-world Methodists. For there, simple-hearted souls are wrapped up in their faith, and put first the life of the spirit, feeding it with prayer and holy psalm, expressing it in ardent French hymns, and looking to it that the everyday life, so quiet, so pure, is brought into the Holy Presence which is ever about them. And consecrated lives are eager to help others. So one has seen a sweet, modest, country girl deny herself to give more liberally to the faith she loves, to give that it may be carried to far-off lands; and yet that it may be preached in a rough coast district where fisher people are poor and untaught and peculiarly open to temptation. There is a certain little mission-hall at Rocquaine where the sea is broad and beautiful, and the little stone cottages lie close together under the tamarisks. And workers from larger chapels help with all their hearts in the music and services. This must ever be the secret of the influence of Methodism. It is a wonderful brotherhood, and nowhere is it better exemplified than in the French Methodist Circuit of Guernsey.

USES OF THE CHURCH.

"WHY go to Church?" was the subject of a sermon preached by the Rev. J. Page Hopps on Sunday morning, Nov. 7, at the re-opening of the Stockport Unitarian Church, a sermon specially addressed to the young people. There are many aspects of the question, as the preacher showed, and on one of these he dwelt in the latter part of his sermon. From a report in the Stockport Chronicle we take the following summary:—

"One need not go into deep research to find out the use of the church even to high-spirited modern-minded young men. The very quiet and reverent decorousness of the church was good. Those of them who were getting on in life felt that life was growing more noisy everyday, more demonstrative, more violent, more fashionable, more exaggerated from time to time. The man who lived all the week amidst the noise, discords, and exaggerations, who came for a quiet blessed Sunday hour, realised its quietness, its simplicity, and its saving power. That sometimes made him say that they ought to come ten minutes before the service began. They spoiled it by coming in late, even by coming in at the time. They should not have to come to church in a hurry. By coming in early and slowly they realised that particular use of the church, which it might be in particular did the young man good. It was perhaps the very thing above all others which the young man wanted, with his forgetfulness and impatience it might be excessive enthusiasm of that rush for everything set to the tune of breaking the record; but let him enjoy his Sunday morning or Sunday evening service for six months, try it, and then like an honest man say if there was not something in it from that point of view. If the church existed for recollection, for meditation, for anticipation it must be good, and he thought they had those three things in every service. It was good for a young man to meditate, to think how he was going to spend his time. It might do him untold good, it might be the salvation of his soul, in a sense he did not comprehend, if he could bring into his life more recollection and meditation. He ought to give the inner life a chance. He was to be pitied who was only lead by the outer life of the world, and who was not acquainted with the meaning of the inner life. The old words came back—'Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth.' In the church they found precious helps in the uplifting of life. There was more than enough in the outer life to bear a life down in these days of stress and storm, of danger and temptation, even in business, for young men. There was no man who did not every day in his life, in no cant sense, in no church sense, in a commonplace human sense, need a Saviour. There they saw the clean side of life, pure ideals, great motives, sustaining hopes, consoling promises—let them call it the saving of the soul. In the Old Book there were the words 'Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his ways? By taking heed thereto according to thy word.' If the church could not give him that, it was not very likely he would get it anywhere else. In the church they felt and strengthened the oft-forgotten ties of sympathy and unity. 'The rich and poor met together, the Lord is the maker of them all.' The church provided a special charm for the blessed Sunday. Of course they could have a Sunday without a church, but would it be the right kind of help for the struggling men or the high-spirited modern person? He hoped the time would come when they would have two Sundays, one for pleasure, for the entire giving up of oneself to recreation, and the other closely kept to the mind, the conscience, the spirit, the sentiment, the emotion, and the worship of God."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

A PROVINCIAL LETTER from the Eastern Counties must chiefly be a chronicle of work done by the individual congregations. The churches are so far apart that little united action is possible. Ministers separated by a distance of twenty miles regard each other as near neighbours, and the Eastern Union covers a district about eighty miles in length and sixty miles in breadth, and includes only twelve churches. A large district meeting is almost an impossibility and exchanges are rare. The Eastern Union has, therefore, great difficulties to meet, and it meets them well. It is the only medium by which the stronger churches can lend a hand to the weaker, and it provides the only opportunities our ministers have of meeting and encouraging one another. More than half our churches being in villages, they are, of course, not very strong. We have no large towns here, and consequently there is little room for fresh congregations. A great desire has, however, been manifested by the Executive of the Union to extend its influence. Inquiries were made some months ago at Felixstowe, but it was deemed inadvisable on the report received to start work there. Mr. Badland has occasionally visited the few Unitarians now resident in Lowestoft and made them more acquainted with each other, but there seems to be no opening for a vigorous forward movement there. A forward movement in this part of the country would mean the neglect of other duties. Our funds are small, some of our churches are, and have been for a long time, without ministers, and our energies are better directed in endeavouring to repair the breaches and build the old waste places. What our smaller congregations feel the need of most is a minister who will occasionally lend them help and give them encouragement by taking Sunday duty. Of this they so constantly remind the Secretary of the Union that he sometimes feels guilty of grave neglect of duty.

The ministers of our churches naturally cannot give this help, and our Union is not able, as some of our larger and richer Unions have recently shown themselves to be, to engage the services of a minister. I often think that it would be a capital thing if a missionary could be supported by our denomination who should give his attention to two or three of the weaker Unions, such as our own and that in the South. In some of our smaller congregations there are often difficulties which the advice of a capable man in such a position would easily remove. The greater churches have had the benefit of the services of the Rev. Stopford Brooke. Could not the smaller ones have the benefit of a lesser light? This seems a pointed suggestion. It is not so intended. Already the smaller Unions are too much indebted to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to wish that it should do more. But for its timely and liberal assistance some of the churches in this district would have been closed and others would have been weaker. Only at our last Executive meeting much time was spent in discussing whether we could find any way of raising funds so as to relinquish one of the Association's grants. I, therefore, simply mention the need, seeing no way of meeting it at present. The ministers, as they are unable to assist on the Sunday, are endeavouring to do what they can during the week. A circular has been issued to some of the congregations giving a list of subjects on which they are willing to lecture. It is hoped by this means that the members will be drawn closer together, and that some strangers will be induced to come in. Some of the subjects are religious, and others literary.

In order to encourage the scattered congregations and to discover in what way they can be of service, the Executive's meetings are held at different chapels. During the past year Lynn, Bury, Diss and Ipswich have thus been visited. At Bury and Lynn the Executive met the members of the congregations and talked over their chapel affairs. In the evening addresses were delivered by the ministers present. The old custom was to choose the most convenient centre for the Executive's meeting and to avoid the outlying places. The new plan will be adopted in the future, and greater efforts will be put forth to make the evening meetings more widely known to those outside. Some of our churches are showing signs of very healthy life.

Mr. Fuller has done good work at Braintree. Until three years ago he divided his energies between this congregation and that at Halstead. A year ago the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties took over the work at Halstead, and they have made it a greater success than we could have done with our limited number of lay-preachers. It was prophesied that not a dozen people in Braintree would enter a Unitarian chapel. But thirty people are often found in the picturesque iron building in the morning and sixty in the evening, and these mostly men. Considering that Braintree is only a village, though the inhabitants through ancient tradition speak of it as a town, the average number of Unitarians there is far greater than in most of our cities. Various societies meet during the week. A class for boys is carried on by Miss Courtauld, who is teaching them in an admirable manner through amusements the lessons of fairness, honesty and self-control. Such classes are always an excellent addition to church work if some one takes the proper interest in them. Otherwise, they are best left alone.

Mr. Amey continues his useful work at Bedfield and Framlingham, proving that the message of Unitarianism, when taught simply, is intelligible and helpful to working men who have not had the advantages of a modern education and whose lives are spent far away from towns and cities in the cultivation of the soil. They are as enthusiastic about our principles as any of our more cultured congregations, and find them elevating to their whole life. To see the labourers in their working clothes gather into the room to listen to an address on Unitarianism is an experience worth having and is a most significant refutation, if any is needed, of the charge sometimes brought against us that we have no gospel for any but an educated middle-class. The work is supported by the ladies of the Postal Mission who may justly be proud of it. During October successful missionary services were conducted by the Rev. F. Summers, of London, the reports of which will be too fresh in the reader's memory to require repetition.

The members of the Friars-street Chapel, Ipswich, have celebrated their bicentenary by thoroughly repairing and redecorating their building at a cost of over £1,200. This has meant great effort and self-sacrifice on their part. About £150 remains to be cleared off from this amount, and an additional £80 has been spent during the past month in heating apparatus. An excellent little history in pamphlet form has been written by one of the members, and will be gladly forwarded to any subscriber past or future. The minister is working hard to reduce the adverse balance, and will be glad to deliver lantern lectures to any society that will subscribe a guinea to the fund. All the congregation have worked unweariedly and pluckily to bring their chapel, one of the oldest Nonconformist meeting-houses in the Eastern Counties, into its present splendid condition. At one time it was thought the structure would have to be pulled down, but an architect of great ability and antiquarian tastes kindly promised to place his services at the disposal of the congregation at a very small cost.

In the Rev. L. Tavener the church has an able and active pastor, who is working with great success. The congregations have increased, and it is pleasant to receive letters from him with the postscript "Another family has joined us this week." Mr. Tavener, it will be remembered, was refused as a member of the Christian Social Settlement, because "a Unitarian cannot be a Christian."

The congregation at Lynn have been long in finding a minister to suit them, but there is now a likelihood of the settlement of a capable man there. One of the characteristics of churches in the Eastern Counties is that they hold together well even when they have no minister. At Lynn they have been without one for two years, but through the labours of their energetic secretary, Mr. Bush, there has been no falling off in the membership. The services have generally been taken by their own members, who were determined that the chapel should not be closed for one Sunday.

At Norwich there has been quiet and steady work done which has borne fruit. At the beginning of the year an effort was made to celebrate the incoming of the twentieth century by gaining twenty new subscribers. These were added in January, and during the year twenty more have joined. Our subscribing membership is, therefore, larger at the present time than it has been for more than a quarter of a century. Most of the new subscribers are young people, others have been attending the chapel occasionally for years, but never definitely connected themselves with it, and others had not been in the Octagon until recently. We do not expect a great increase from outside, and we are hoping to build up a strong congregation from within. For this purpose and in order that our organisation may be perfect, a register is being made. The plan was suggested by Mr. King, and has been worked-out by him after reference to the methods of other denominations. As I think it may prove of assistance to other churches, and might possibly be worked in connection with the new Guild movement, I will give a copy of a page. Figures represent columns. 1. Register number; 2. Date of birth; 3. Christian name; 4. Christian names of father and mother; 5. Surname; 6. Baptised; 7. Admitted to Sunday-school; 8. Junior membership; 9. Adult membership; 10. Died; 11. Left the city; 12. Postal address; 13. Joined what Church; 14. Remarks. If the registrar does his duty, no drifting which is probably the chief cause of the weakness of our churches will be possible. We have registered all the children of our members and all the young people in our Sunday-school above the age of fourteen, whose parents are not members. At fifteen they are invited to become members of the minister's class, for the study of religion, held during the week, and later are asked to enter the Church. They then become junior members. Adult membership follows when they are in a position to subscribe. We have thus, we hope, effectually bridged over the gulf that yawned between our Sunday-schools and Church. In May twenty-five were admitted to junior membership. Some became subscribers at once, and probably most, if not all the rest, will follow their example when they are able. Perhaps some will imagine that our organisation will be too rigid and that we shall interfere with individual liberty. We shall by no means do that. No pressure will be brought to bear. After the minister has explained the principles for which we stand, the young people are asked to write to him if they are desirous of becoming members. Too many of our young people have been allowed to drift away, and unfortunately they have not joined other churches. And it would probably have been well for them if strong measures had been taken to keep them within the circle of religious life. We need all our young people at the Octagon. Of late years some of the oldest and staunchest supporters have passed away, and many of those who remain are not able to give the same help as they did a few years ago. Our winter's work was inaugurated this year by an autumnal social gathering. The Rev. W. C. Hall, of Ashton-under-Lyne, was invited to visit and address the congregation. And his speech dealing with some of the most urgent problems of our time and the attitude of the Church towards them was inspiring to all present.

At Yarmouth the Rev. C. D. Badland has laboured heroically for the past two years, and has rendered valuable assistance to our Union in visiting churches and places which other ministers could not. The congregation at Bury St. Edmunds struggles on without a minister.

In the Eastern Counties there has, therefore, been a decided move forward. We are sometimes accused of moving slowly in this district, but we move as slowly backward as forward. And if every year proves as good for Unitarianism in East Anglia as the past has done, we shall soon lose our reputation for slowness.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, KENTISH TOWN.

SIR,—Referring to the notice in your issue of to-day, under the heading "London, Kentish Town," announcing the fact of the resignation of the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, I wish it to be understood that I am in no way responsible for such notice, and had no knowledge of it until I read it in your paper.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Christmas Appeal.

London : Mansford-street.—Mr. Cadman thanks the friends who have helped in former years, and again makes the usual appeal for the Mansford-street Mission, Bethnal Green. He asks (1) for especially liberal donations and subscriptions to the Poor's Purse. For some years the disbursements have exceeded the income, and a large balance, the result of a special appeal, is now exhausted, and a considerable sum is due to the treasurer. This fund not only helps the sick and poor in temporary trouble, but provides several pensions for aged persons connected with the Mission. Mr. Cadman is most anxious that before the end of the year this fund shall be placed in a satisfactory condition, and he earnestly asks for new subscriptions. (2) Donations are asked to the Christmas Fund by means of which Christmas dinners are provided in a number of poor homes; presents in clothing, books, and toys are made to more than 300 scholars and to various others connected with the Mission; and the usual Christmas entertainments and parties are provided for the congregation, the mothers' meetings, the Sunday-school, &c. (3) Parcels of clothing are asked for. Every description of wearing apparel, new and worn, is of service. Books and toys are also welcomed. Letters and parcels should be sent as early as possible, directed to the Rev. W. G. Cadman, Mansford-street Parsonage, Bethnal Green, E.

Ainsworth.—On Saturday last a dramatic recital was given in the schoolroom by Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, and was very much appreciated. The proceeds, which were for the Chapel Renovation Fund, amounted altogether to a little over £7. The Rev. M. R. Scott presided.

Bolton District Sunday School Union.—The fifteenth annual meeting of this Union was held on Saturday, Nov. 23, 1901, at the Unitarian Church, Horwich, when there was a large attendance of teachers and delegates from the various schools. A short business meeting was held at six, the President, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Leigh, in the chair. The Committee's report and the Treasurer's statement of accounts were read, and it was shown that the Union had had an encouraging and successful year's work, and had a balance in hand of £7 7s. 11½d. The President, in moving the adoption of the report and balance-sheet congratulated the Association on the gratifying progress made. He yielded to no one in his enthusiastic admiration of that self-sacrificing band of men and women who devoted time and energy to the much-needed work of their Sunday-schools. Particularly was he grateful to the numerous young people who took part in the work; many of them, as he knew, would prefer to be taught rather than take the responsibility of a class upon themselves, if they consulted their own inclinations. It was their duty as an Association to say and do all in their power to encourage and help these young people, and if they were going to have the right kind of teachers it became more and more certain year by year that they must "grow their own." He was always glad to see a teachers' preparatory class mentioned as one of the church's institutions, and he would urge that there should be one in connection with every school in the Union. The Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent, seconded the resolution, and while expressing himself delighted by the various signs of life and activity, reminded the Union of the saying of someone, that the largest room in the world was the room for improvement. He heartily endorsed what Mr. Dolphin had said with regard to young teachers. All teachers would be better for more thorough training for their important work. Those of them who had been to the summer meetings at the Manchester College, Oxford, would know how much what they had seen and heard there had raised their ideal of Sunday-school work, and he urged all who were able to endeavour next summer to get a week or ten days there. A vote of thanks to the officers of the Society having been passed, Mr. Edgar M. Taylor, of Bolton, took the chair, and expressed his hearty loyalty to the cause, and his deep interest in the work. The meeting then adjourned down stairs to the schoolroom, where an excellent musical programme was rendered, and after votes of thanks to the Horwich friends for their hospitality, to the Chairman for presiding, and to the ladies and gentlemen who had provided the entertainment, proposed by the Rev. E. S. Hicks, and seconded by Mr. Thomas Harwood, a most successful gathering was brought to a conclusion.

Bolton : Unity Church.—Mr. John Harwood's recent recital of Dickens's "Cricket on the Hearth" was a great success, and very warmly appreciatel. A large and influential audience was gathered in the schoolroom for the evening's entertainment.

Bradford.—On Monday evening Mr. Ferdinand Heilborn delivered his second lecture on his tour in Italy before the literary society connected with Chapel-lane Chapel, and there was a large and appreciative audience. Beginning with mediæval Rome, the lecturer gave a graphic description of the Eternal City as it stands to-day, with its art treasures and memorials of ancient glory. He also gave his hearers a vivid and discriminating presentation of the special characteristics of Naples, Florence, Venice, and other places which he had visited. The lecture was beautifully illustrated with a choice selection of fifty lantern slides. The Rev. E. C. Jones was in the chair, and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer.

Chesterfield.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted on Sunday week in Elder Yard Chapel, by the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, of Monton, formerly minister of the chapel, and on the following Monday evening the congregational tea took place, followed by a meeting of welcome to the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, the newly-appointed minister, and Mrs. Evans. Alderman J. Pearson, J.P., presided, and among those present were the Revs. A. Bennett, J. Birks, J. K. Smith, E. E. Jenkins, S. H. Street, and Dr. Griffiths. Speeches of cordial welcome were made by the Chairman and several of the ministers present, to which Mr. Evans replied. Mr. Bennett was also thanked for his services on the previous day. At the conclusion of the meeting a presentation of an illuminated address and a silver inkstand was made to Mr. G. Broomhead, in acknowledgment of his services as chapel warden for fourteen years, and especially of his interest in the renovation of the chapel and schools. The presentation was made by Miss Swanwick and Alderman Pearson, and acknowledged by Mr. Broomhead in suitable terms.

Deal.—The church has been deeply touched by the painfully sudden death of Miss Bertha Addiscott, the founder of the Reading Circle and a firm supporter of the Postal Mission. She and her sisters came from Ramsgate nearly two years ago, and the deceased lady was looking forward to living at Kearsney, near Dover, where she was building a house. She came of an old Hackney family.

Gloucester.—A Sale of Work was held on Friday week in the schoolroom of Barton-street Chapel to raise £50, the remaining balance of the £800 spent some years ago in alterations and renovation of the interior of the church; by previous efforts all but £150 had been paid, and the efforts of the congregation, with the help of a few friends in the country, had recently produced £100. The sale was opened by Mrs. E. Sidney Hartland, who was supported by the Mayoress, the wife of the City High Sheriff, the Rev. Walter Lloyd, and others. Mrs. Hartland, in declaring the sale open, referred to the satisfaction she had found in working with Unitarians at Swansea as well as at Gloucester. At Swansea Unitarians had been pioneers of public work by ladies, and she had owed much stimulus to them. She hoped to see Unitarians stand side by side with the members of other churches in the public business of the city, and she thought that if congregations stood hand in hand the influence of evil would be conquered, and there would be a better spirit in Gloucester and in England. The profits of the sale amounted to over £40.

Huddersfield.—Fitzwilliam-street Church was reopened on Sunday last, Nov. 24, after having been closed three Sundays for cleaning, painting and repairs. The minister, the Rev. W. Mellor, conducted the services, preaching in the morning on "The Church of the Living God," 1 Timothy iii. 14-15; and in the evening on "The World-wide Call of Christ," Mark xiii. 27. The musical portions of the service, under the management of Miss Holmes, the organist, and Mr. Taylor Cotton, the choirmaster, were excellent, and Mme. Effie Thomas, a daughter of a former minister, well known in the musical world, and ever ready to serve Fitzwilliam-street congregation, sang at the evening service with great sweetness, pathos, and power, "Oh Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets" (Mendelssohn). There were good congregations, that of the evening being especially good. The church, one of the architectural gems of the neighbourhood, by the excellence and skill of the painters and decorators, and by the introduction of incandescent lights, instead of the old style of gas-lights, together with other substantial improvements, has been made more beautiful and harmonious than ever. The total estimated cost of what has thus already been done, and of what remains to be done, is about £120, towards which the congregation itself has already raised, by subscriptions and collections on Sunday, between £60 and £70, and on the basis of this self-help is earnestly appealing to the help of friends in general, in order that the whole amount may be raised without either bazaar or sale of work. The general outlook for the church is bright and cheering, though much still remains to be done.

Leeds : Hunslet.—The reopening services, after renovation, were held here on Nov. 10 and 17, the preachers being the Revs. C. H. Cook, of Holbeck, and E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford. The Mill Hill choir kindly gave a musical service in the afternoon of the 10th, and the local choir gave a sacred cantata in the afternoon of the 17th. Good congregations assembled, and the buildings present a very neat appearance. A new gable window of leaded lights has been put into the chapel, and members of the congregation have supplied it with incandescent burners. On Nov. 23rd the first social of the season was held, when upwards of 100 sat down to tea, being the most successful for a number of years.

London : Channing House School, Highgate.—The following successes have been achieved:—Intermediate Arts, A. Harley; Oxford Local (Senior), J. Gough; Ditto (Junior), A. Wilson.

London : Stamford-street.—On Monday laast at a meeting of the Social Institute, Miss Ella A. Bridge gave much pleasure to a large audience by her renderings of selections from Shakespeare, Longfellow, Whittier, Dickens, and other authors; with several of the recitals a musical accompaniment, by Mr. Sidney Rea, was very effective. On the motion of Messrs. A. A. Tayler and A. W. Harris, a very hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Miss Bridge and Mr. Rea; the Rev. Frederic Allen presided. Preceding the above the Mothers' Meeting tea had been held, forty of the mothers being present. Last Sunday, being Temperance Sunday, the Rev. F. Allen took for the subject of his evening sermon, "For the Children's Sake." There was an excellent congregation, including a good proportion of parents and elder scholars. The singing was led by a choir composed almost entirely of members of the Band of Hope and Mercy.

London : Stepney Green.—Mr. Percy Ames, F.S.A., who has had charge of College Chapel for the last eight months, resigned his position at the end of October. A hearty vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Ames for their energetic labours on behalf of the cause was recently passed at a congregational meeting. The congregation have been fortunate enough to secure the help of the Rev. G. Critchley (late of Burnt Ash Congregational Church), who resigned his pulpit on account of his protest in favour of Peace. The Rev. G. Critchley will conduct evening services for some months, beginning on Dec. 15.

Newbury.—The Rev. E. Turland, by unanimous request of the Committee of the Liberal Club, is conducting a reading circle for the study of social and political questions, the first book taken being Ruskin's "Unto this Last." Mr. Turland opened a second series of week-night meetings, with a lecture on "Alfred the Great." On Wednesday week Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, of Reading, gave the second lecture of the course, his subject being "Early Man in Britain." With diagrams, specimens of early implements, and clear bright speech, he made his theme most interesting and instructive, and warm appreciation was expressed.

Northampton.—On Sunday, Nov. 24, Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., of London, who was conducting the services at the Kettering-road Church, took occasion to speak of his impressions derived from a recent visit to Hungary. On the previous evening Mr. Shrubsole delivered the Saturday Evening Talk at the Town Hall. Here he adapted the treatment of the same subject to a miscellaneous audience, and illustrated the descriptions by a series of lantern views. The hall was well filled and the lecture much appreciated.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Association.—Mr. R. Newell writes to disclaim the credit of having originated the new Union, which he attributes to Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, of Blackpool, who mooted the idea two years ago. The Rev. D. Davis, who was mentioned last week as present at the inaugural meeting, was prevented from being there.

Richmond.—The annual Sale of Work is to be held on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 5, at The Knoll, Ormond-road. Provision has been made of plain as well as fancy work, and articles suitable for Christmas gifts to friends, to hospitals, and to the poor. It is requested that all articles for the sale be sent to The Knoll by Dec. 3. Tea, coffee, and light refreshments will be served during the afternoon.

Rotherham.—On Wednesday evening, Nov. 13, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, gave an address to the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union on his recent visit to Hungary. The address, which vividly described the experiences of the party, with which our readers are already familiar, is fully reported in more than a column of the Rotherham Advertiser of Nov. 23.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—A very successful gathering was held in the Vestry Hall on Tuesday evening in connection with Unitarian Forward Movement, recently inaugurated by Sunday evening services. The Revs. J. Ellis and J. E. Jenkins were among the speakers, and a pleasant evening's entertainment was provided. The Rev. J. E. Manning, who was to have presided, was kept away by indisposition, but sent a letter of greeting.

Stockport.—The reopening services were continued last Sunday, being taken by the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, D.Sc., of Liverpool. The collections amounted to about £20, bringing the amount collected at the reopening services to nearly £50 in all.

Styal.—On Saturday, Nov. 23, the annual congregational party in connection with the Norcliffe Chapel, Styal, was held. The Treasurer, Mr. Morton Jackson, was able to declare that he had a small balance in hand, and the Secretary, Mr. James Henshall, jun., gave a summary of the chief incidents of the year. The officers, and Messrs. Hope and Shaw, as members of the Committee, were re-elected. The Rev. E. L. H. Thomas and Mr. Henry P. Greg spoke at some length in favour of more active congregational life, and made suggestions with that end in view. The question of a roll of membership was discussed, and also the desirability of holding more frequent gatherings of the congregation. It was decided to send a subscription to Essex Hall, and to procure some of its religious literature to disseminate among the people; and to show further interest in the outside work of the church by subscribing to the National Conference and to the East Cheshire Christian Union. A donation of £1 1s. was voted towards the deficit in connection with the "Forward Movement," promoted by the East Cheshire Christian Union.

Torquay.—Among the lectures recently given at Unity Hall, was one on Saturday, Nov. 16, by Mr. Charles Charrington, a member of the Committee of the Fabian Society, on the subject of "Ethics and Politics," and another on Monday, Nov. 18, by Mr. S. S. Bouse, of St. Marychurch, on "Gardening for Pleasure."

Wakefield.—On Sunday last, Nov. 24, the anniversary Sunday-school services were conducted in Westgate Chapel by Mr. J. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, and the Rev. A. Chalmers. There were large congregations both morning and evening, and the collections for the school fund realised £10, and will probably be increased. On Monday evening the annual soirée was held in the schoolroom, when about 160 persons partook of a substantial tea. At the subsequent meeting a most gratifying surprise was in store for Mr. Chalmers, who was presented in the presence of a large and enthusiastic assemblage with a costly gold watch as a proof of the warm attachment of the congregation, and as a memento of the completion of twenty-one years of his ministry in Wakefield. In presenting this, Mr. Dunnill spoke in highly appreciative terms of the value of Mr. Chalmers' services in his special sphere of ministerial work, and in all that tended to the benefit and progress of the city in which they lived. He referred also to the generosity with which their minister had assisted the poor and unfortunate, and the great influence he had exercised in all local philanthropic movements. As one who had been connected with Westgate Chapel for twenty-eight years, he was glad to say he had never known the congregation and its connected institutions in a more prosperous condition, or more united and hopeful. He expressed the hope that Mr. Chalmers would be spared to continue his work among them for a long time to come. Mr. Chalmers, in reply, said the secret had been well kept, for he had had absolutely no previous knowledge or expectation of receiving so beautiful a gift. He had noticed that for many months past the relation existing between congregation and minister had become closer, more helpful, and encouraging, and it was cheering to feel how cordially all had lately worked for the common good. His gratitude could not be expressed as he would wish, but that day would be a bright and happy memory to the end of life. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Conway for his part in the services of the preceding day, to which he responded in a pleasant and helpful speech. The Rev. John Ellis, of Sheffield, spoke impressively in reference to the religious training of the young, and the proceedings concluded with a few words from the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, of Bury, a trustee of Westgate Chapel. Music at intervals during the evening was supplied by the choir and other friends.

Walmsley.—Last Saturday the organist, Mr. A. Hilton, and his blind concert party, assisted by a few ladies, gave an excellent concert in the schoolroom, which was crowded by an appreciative audience. The Rev. E. Allen presided, and a cordial vote of thanks was given to the performers.

MR. W. S. LILLY, who is a Roman Catholic of the Liberal school, in his very interesting work "Renaissance Types" lately published, refers as follows to a work well known to many of our readers:—"Among English writers on Luther the first place must be given to Dr. (Charles) Beard. It is an irreparable loss that he lived to execute no more than the first volume of what would certainly have been a monumental work."

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE, ABERYSTWITH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES THOMAS.

Pupils most successfully prepared for Public Examinations. Scholarships have been obtained at the University Colleges. Special attention paid to the physical side of education. Gymnasium. Swedish drill.

LADY (Liberal Christian, L.L.A. Hons.), about to REMOVE her School to the Seaside, can receive a few more BOARDERS. High-class education. Moderate inclusive fees.—AKANTHE, Office of INQUIRER.

PRIOR'S FIELD, GODALMING, SURREY.

Mrs. LEONARD HUXLEY (formerly Scholar of Somerville Hall, Oxford; 1st class in English Literature, Oxford Honours Examination for Women) will OPEN a SCHOOL for GIRLS at the above address, in JANUARY, 1902. Prior's Field is an attractive modern house, 2 miles from Godalming, on high ground. There is a garden of about 4 acres, and 14 acres of field and copse. The soil is green sand. The usual school subjects will be taught by a competent staff, amongst whom will be a resident French teacher. French will be spoken for a good part of each day. Special pains will be bestowed on the teaching of English Literature and English Composition. Class Singing and Drawing will be regarded as essential parts of the School course. Organised Games, such as Cricket and Lacrosse will be started as soon as the numbers are sufficient, and from the first there will be Tennis, Croquet, Bowls, &c., and Swedish health exercises by a trained teacher. Part of the grounds will be set apart as Girls' Gardens, and gardening tastes will be encouraged. The School will be unsectarian. Attendance at Church or Chapel can be arranged as parents desire. But the religious teaching given in School will not be that of any particular denomination. It will aim at fostering the spirit of reverence, of mutual tolerance, of love of right and hatred of evil—in a word, of Christian discipleship—dwelling on the things that unite rather than on those that divide.

Fees from £108 a year. For prospectus and further particulars, apply to Mrs. LEONARD HUXLEY.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Christmas appeals from the missions, which will be found at the head of our "News from the Churches" column this week and last—and doubtless there will be others next week—we earnestly commend to the attention of our readers. Our Christmas will again be darkened by the thought of South Africa, and this year with an added bitterness in the thought of the thousands of little ones who have perished in the camps; but the old sorrows and burdens of our own people also remain, and while we seem to be helpless in the face of that other tragedy, here something may be done. Let the heart of generous charity be opened indeed, and give abundantly through the hands of those devoted men who give their lives in brotherly service among the poor!

THE column "Among the Churches" in Wednesday's Daily News contained two paragraphs concerning Dr. John Hunter, whose recent settlement at the King's Weigh House Church, Grosvenor-square, we have already welcomed as a noteworthy gain to the forces of Liberal Christianity in London. The contributor of the paragraphs elicited an acknowledgment of the difficulty of pulpit work in London—a difficulty which is not confined to the region of the West-end squares, and after a reference to a warning on this subject, received from his friend, Dr. Stopford Brooke, we find the following sentences attributed by the interviewer to Dr. Hunter :—

> I have always been inclined to wish that Dr. Brooke had retained his independent position without adopting the label, Unitarian. For, really, there is little to divide him from us, though I have never heard him once express regret at his severance from a church in which he would certainly have risen to be a bishop.

Mr. Brooke will laugh at the vision of himself in lawn sleeves thus conjured up, but certainly will feel no twinge of remorse at having escaped the yoke of even the most dignified ecclesiastical collar. Nor, so far as we know, has he ever been much troubled about the "label" Unitarian. When, for the sake of spiritual freedom, he came out of the Church of England, ours was the only religious fellowship open to receive him, and he has frankly thrown in his lot with us. If now there is little to divide him from the "us" for whom Dr. Hunter speaks, the same is true of many other less distinguished, but no less sincere and devoted, Unitarian teachers, but Dr. Hunter's "us" cannot be the members of the Evangelical Free Church Council.

THE Address given by the Rev. L. P. Jacks last October at the opening of the session of Manchester College, Oxford, on "The Destination of the Student—the Settled Ministry, and an Alternative," has now been printed (by Messrs. Rawson and Co., Manchester), and issued to the Trustees of the College. A great part of the Address appeared in full, with a summary of the rest, in THE INQUIRER of Oct. 19, and referring to it in a leading article we said that it would be published by the College. That appears to have been a mistake, but we understand that copies of the Address may be had for the asking, so long as there are any left.

MR. JACKS'S Address is the subject of an article in this month's Seed Sower, by the Rev. Joseph Wood, the editor. Under the heading "A Preaching Order," Mr. Wood describes the ideal set forth in the College address, but while acknowledging its attractiveness points out that the Head of such an Order cannot be had for asking: "John Wesley and General Booth were not summoned by others to inspire and train their companies of preachers, any more than were Dominic and Francis. They took the field under a divine and overwhelming impulse, and never offered themselves as candidates for a post."

Nevertheless, while the dream of a Preaching Order must wait for its man, who will assuredly take his own course, and attract his own disciples, Mr. Jacks has done good service in emphasising our need, the church's need, the world's need, of persuasive preaching. At the present moment a certain tendency to depreciate preaching may be noticed among us. In the presence of a much-needed revival of interest in worship, appreciation of its purpose, care for its details, preaching is sometimes spoken of as if it were time the sermon took a back seat. One is accustomed to this in churches where priestly functions are first and foremost, but it is not a little surprising to meet with it in our Free Churches. Sixty years ago, a writer in one of the famous "Tracts for the Times" said—"We would not be thought entirely to deprecate preaching as a means of doing good. It may be necessary in a weak and languishing state, &c." On the contrary, good preaching is, and always has been, the work of a church having any pretence to be a teacher of truth. Every revival of religion during the last two thousand years has been the result of a revival of preaching power.

The importance of preaching! Mr. Jacks does well to emphasise it. For preaching has a special place and value in our Free Churches; it is the very breath of their nostrils; unless our ministers can preach they have no raison d'être. Preaching is their supreme, although by no means their only, function. Yet everything else could be carried on by the church in the absence of the preacher. Worship, Sunday-schools, benevolent enterprises, the visitation of the sick, weddings, funerals, all these, and many other offices of the church, could be discharged by laymen, and without specially appointed ministers. But preaching touches another plane; the prophetic gift must needs be sought out, subjected to a severe discipline and set apart, if its dews are to refresh the fields the Lord loveth; and the minister who cannot persuasively preach is manifestly out of place in our church economy.

THIS clear recognition of the vital place of preaching in the ministry of religion, and what is demanded of the minister in the perfecting of his gift, and of the congregation to secure the right spirit of receptiveness, was set forth with unsurpassed power by the late John Hamilton Thom, in those three sermons on "The Preacher and the Church," with which he opened his second term of ministry at Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, in 1857. Those searching words ought not to be lost to our churches, and we are glad to announce that they will be found in a volume of selections from Mr. Thom's special sermons to be published immediately by Mr. Philip Green, under the title "A Minister of God," which will be a companion volume to "Christ the Revealer." Another valuable article in this month's Seed Sower, from the pen of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, we are privileged to print entire in our present issue.

THE question of the Housing of the Working Classes is commanding a great deal of attention at the present time, and it is interesting, therefore, to learn that the December number of The Studio will contain an important illustrated article describing Mr. George Cadbury's successful solution of the difficult problem at the beautiful village of Bournville, near Birmingham.

THE CONCENTRATION CAMPS.

SIR,—My attention has been directed to a statement in your last issue, quoted from a correspondent, but not endorsed by you, that "the death-rate of children in our northern towns has been found, on careful medical comparison, to be actually greater than in the camps in question, taken on month to month records." As a citizen of a northern town (Manchester), which has the unenviable distinction of standing in the matter of general death-rate so low as 31 in a list of 33 of our great towns, I am moved by this statement to some degree of jealousy, even for its doubtful reputation.

There is now in course of signature in Manchester a carefully prepared non-political memorial on the subject of these camps. From it I find that the general death-rate in June for all white persons in the camps was 109 per 1,000 per annum, in July 180, in August 213, and in September 264. The corrected death-rate for Manchester for all persons was 27·34 per 1,000 for the year 1900.

Taking the case of children alone, it is more difficult to make an accurate comparison, because there seems to be some doubt as to exactly what is meant by "children" in the camp returns. I have not a copy of the Blue Book before me, but from correspondence which I have seen I gather that children seems to mean persons under twelve years of age. Now I see from the same memorial that there were in the camps in June 43,075 white children, and that 576 died; this gives an annual death-rate of not less than 157 per 1,000. In July—children, 46,366; deaths, 1,124; annual rate not less than 286. In August—children, 52,225; deaths, 1,545; annual rate not less than 349. In September—children, 54,326; deaths, 1,964; annual rate not less than 428.

Turning to the Manchester statistics (I quote from the official report), I find that the death-rate for children (for the year 1900) under 5 years of age was 72·74; from 5 to 10 years of age, 5·12; and from 10 to 15 years of age, 2·50 per 1,000. The average of these gives a death-rate of 26·78.

It will be noted how high the death-rate is of children under five years. This is, of course, accounted for by its including the cases of what is known as infant mortality—namely, the deaths of children under one year old, which is everywhere very high. In Manchester the rate of infant mortality is no less than 188·7 for every 1,000 children born. In any given population in which the percentage of births and of children under one year old is less than the normal, the death-rate for children generally ought, other things being equal, to be also below the normal. Now I find it is admitted by writers on both sides that—as a little reflection upon the circumstances under which the Boers have for some time past been living and are now living in the camps will show—the percentage of infants in the camps must be a low one. This conclusion is confirmed by the following quotation from a leading article in the Manchester Guardian of Nov. 27: "There were from May to August only 579 deaths of infants as against no less than 2,290 deaths of children between one year and twelve," i.e., in the Transvaal camps. There were in Manchester in the year 1900, 3,315 deaths of infants under one year as against only 1,005 between one and two years, 318 between two and three years, 210 between three and four years, and 181 between four and five years. From these figures one may judge how the death-rate of children ought to fall, instead of increase, where, as in the case of the camps, the proportion of infants falls below the average.

Turning to another statement of your correspondent—namely, "the death-rate of Boer children in their own homes before the war exceeded the mortality in the camps"—one is tempted to ask, how comes it that any children were left to bring into the camps, or, indeed, any Boers to fight with? I find the birth-rate of Manchester given at 31·88 per 1,000. The Boers are said to be a prolific people. Let us, then, double this birth-rate for them, and then looking back at the death-rate of their children in the camps, said to have been exceeded in their homes, consider how long ago the whole population ought to have become extinct.

The uncleanly and ignorant habits of the Boer women are sometimes adduced as the true cause of these painful death statistics. Assuming that they are as bad as they are painted, which there is some reason to doubt, these habits surely constitute a most cogent reason why these women should not have been gathered together in such a manner as that their habits must tell with terrible effect. The habits of the natives of Bombay are not, I imagine, very sanitary, but I have seen it stated—I cannot verify it—that the death-rate in the camps exceeds the death-rate in Bombay during the plague. At most the habits of the women can be but one of many contributing causes.

The words of Hamlet rise to my mind:

> Mother, for love of grace
> Lay not that flattering unction to your soul,
> That not your trespass but my madness speaks.

It is because we think that our beloved Mother-country is laying too many flattering unctions to her soul that I and others, who think like me, feel compelled to protest, feebly it may be and ineffectually, at the present moment. In this matter of the camps we do not desire to impute deliberate cruelty to anyone. But we do feel that there has been great want of foresight, and some of us think that this terrible state of things is to a large extent an almost inevitable outcome of the policy which has been pursued. We feel that these facts ought not to be hushed up, but ought to be burned into the public conscience, and while we admit that it would be most wrong to wilfully exaggerate them, we also feel that it is equally wrong, and probably more dangerous to minimise or gloss over their significance.

Finally, may I add that I do not see where such protests can be more appropriately made than in journals like your own, dedicated to the promotion of religion, for in this war we are confronted with a whole series of questions vitally connected with the religious life. That the moral and spiritual aspect of these questions should be discussed, and, if possible, made clear, seems to me, to be of the highest importance if religion is to continue to be anything but a name and a ceremony. All the questions which divide the sects pale into insignificance before the fundamental problems of Justice, Love, and Mercy, which are involved in great national crises such as this. If there be some to whom the discussion of these matters gives offence, or who think them out of place in your columns, may we not ask them to bear with those who do not agree with them, but who, like themselves, desire to promote that kingdom of righteousness, that reign of peace and goodwill, which is a principal object of all religion?

JOHN DENDY.

Swinton, Dec. 1.

ON Thursday week Mr. Stopford Brooke concluded his autumn course of five lectures on Poetry at University College, the Botanical theatre being again crowded. Throughout the course an audience, which must have numbered nearly, if not quite, 500, managed to get into the theatre, though each evening some enthusiasts had to stand the whole time. The secretary stated that it had been necessary to refuse 350 applicants for tickets, and for the course in the New Year, which was to begin on Jan. 23, it was hoped to arrange that the lectures might be given twice, Professor Carey Foster, who was in the chair, on behalf of the College authorities, expressed their gratification at the great success of the lectures. Mr. Brooke brought distinction to the College, and his lectures went far to realise their hope that University College might be not only a place of systematic education for regular students, but a centre of intellectual life and stimulus for a wider public.

MR. BROOKE, in giving what was his second lecture on "Rossetti," following those on Matthew Arnold, said that he must leave the consideration of Rossetti as a translator, and the volume of sonnets, "The House of Life," for the first lecture after Christmas, when he would also speak of Christina Rossetti. Three lectures would then be devoted to William Morris, and the concluding lecture would touch upon Charles Tennyson Turner, Barnes, the Devonshire poet, and Coventry Patmore. Swinburne, he said, must be left out, for nothing would ever induce him to lecture on a living poet,

IN speaking of Rossetti and Holman Hunt as the founders of the Præ-Raphaelite Brotherhood in 1848, Mr. Brooke said that they set aside the conventions of the art of their day, and with ardour, imagination, life, and truth, returned to Nature, and all subjects became new in their hands. There had been no such re-birth in art since Wordsworth returned to Nature. In Rossetti's pictures, as in the three entitled "Ave!" they saw realism merged in religious supernaturalism; and in later pictures, with the supernaturalism of the Mediæval Church, felt by a modern through imagination. The "Blessed Damosel" was the best outcome of that attraction; but Rossetti had shown that he could deal with modern subjects also, with marvellous power. Rossetti was incapable of imitation; he made new paths for poetry as he did for painting. Other painters had written poetry, but only for play; no one else was great as he was both as painter and poet; he made his imagination work in two parts in a marvellous way. His poems were not the poems of a painter or conceived with a painter's mind; there were in him two lives in one.

THE ETERNAL WORD AND INCARNATION.

A REPLY TO PROFESSOR KNIGHT, BY THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.*

IN the volume, "Inter Amicos," recently published by Professor William Knight, of St. Andrews, there is one important letter—or rather fragment of a letter—from him to Dr. Martineau, the answer to which, he tells us, has unhappily been lost. It is indeed an unfortunate catastrophe, for it cannot be doubted that Professor Knight's ingenious and subtle plea for the doctrine of the Incarnation of the Eternal Word in the Man Jesus must have been received by Dr. Martineau as a very direct challenge, and must have evoked a rejoinder marked by all his brilliancy of analysis and forcefulness of argument. I am told by the Editor of this magazine that Professor Knight's argument, in the absence of the lost criticism from the master hand, has caught and held many thoughtful persons known to him; and he has asked me to take upon myself the task of tendering such reply as I may be able, in place of the perished document which we would give so much to have in our possession.

It may well seem an audacious compliance to undertake this task. To enter the lists with one of the subtlest and most accomplished of Scottish theologians in itself requires some assurance. But to do so in the stead of that mighty protagonist, whose words must have cloven to the very marrow of their high theme, is to run the risk of condemnation for the extremity of presumption. Yet it would show no true reverence for Martineau to let the verdict go by default against the truths for which he stood. With all diffidence, then, I gird myself to the combat.

It is the old question of the nature of the Eternal Word, together with the relation of Jesus Christ to that Word and to God, the Father. We may take two points as the nuclei of our philosopher's thinking; and his whole letter is an effort to explain and connect together these two ruling thoughts.

The first is this: that since God is by nature Love, there must have been some object of his love existent prior to the creation of any universe at all; and that that object must have been within his own nature, since there existed no other sphere whatever to contain it.

The second is this: that the perfection of the moral and spiritual character of Jesus Christ was so absolute and so unparalleled that it cannot be accounted for under the ordinary laws and conditions of humanity.

These two points of belief are connected together in this letter by an explanation as far removed from Trinitarian orthodoxy as it is from Martineau's own Christian Theism—namely, this: that, though the person of God is single and cannot be divided, yet within that person there is an element which may be described as the Eternal Son or the Eternal Word—not a separate person at all in the ordinary acceptation of the term, but an element in God's own single personality, which was and is and shall be from all eternity the object of his love; and, further, that this Eternal Word was poured into the man Christ Jesus continuously and increasingly during his earthly life till his humanity became morally and spiritually at one with divinity, and he himself became the absolute Son of God, the "express image of his person."

All this is argued with great subtlety and skill, and with much learning and fervent earnestness. Martineau's answer, we have seen, is lost. Let us, then, imagine that we, having perused the letter through and through, are set to send Professor Knight an answer. We cannot imitate his illustrious correspondent's acuteness of analysis or brilliancy of style; but in our own plain way we will try to frame an answer. How shall it go? Suppose we address the St. Andrews theologian thus:—

Dear Professor Knight,—

Your letter interests me deeply. I admire its bold individuality of thought, undaunted by the fear of heresy, and I acknowledge gladly both the acuteness and the truth of many of your subsidiary positions. When, for example, you say that a great truth once suggested may impress itself as true for ever after on the mind, even though the authority which announced it be upset, I am at one with you; and I agree with you that the saying, "I and my Father are one," may reveal a truth never to be lost again to him who meets with it, even though it were to be shown that the Gospel in which it occurs is not historical, and that Jesus himself perhaps never said it.

But in your two main positions I cannot see eye to eye with you, and therefore the argument in which you link them together and explain the one by the other is to me without basis and invalid.

I. You will not, I think, deem me unfair if I state one of your main positions thus: "There is in the person of God an element, which we may call the Eternal Word, which is the object of his love, and which supplied him with an object of love before he had called into being any outward universe at all." At any rate, this is an honest effort on my part to state, in the fewest and plainest words, the things I understand you to mean. This Word of God—even though otherwise called by you the Eternal Son—you assure me is not a separate person in any ordinary meaning of that term, since you are as convinced as I am that the Deity is a single personality. Yet you object to my describing it as simply a function, factor, or relation. You offer as a simile the two foci of an immense ellipse, the two centres from which the radii of that figure diverge, and you suppose a constant movement of affection to be thrilling from each of these foci to the other. But, unsatisfied with your own explanation, you go on to urge that after all "it is confessedly a mystery, beyond the cognisance of the understanding"—a resource which has in all ages been popular with theologians when brought up sharp by the contradictions confronting each other in their own statements. Mystery indeed there is; and we must encounter it again and again when we soar to these high themes; but the plea of mystery never avails to justify us in the assertion of contradictory propositions.

I confess, then, that I am thrown back on the position advanced by Dr. Martineau in an earlier letter to you, and I do not think that he would have admitted that you had solved his difficulty. And I must quote from him his statement that "affection has no reality which does not go forth upon an extrinsic nature—another than the being who feels it," and maintain that a love illustrated by the play of force between the two foci of an ellipse, a love which is all within one Person, even though that Person be Infinite and Transcendent, is no true love at all, certainly bears no analogy to that which we conceive as "the Love of God."

But why is it that you have recourse to this device? Because you assume that there was a time when God had no universe to love, and when he therefore needed an object of love within himself.

Now, I confess I am inclined to agree with you, against Dr. Martineau, when you plead that to suppose a material universe to have existed from all eternity, to be no less eternal than God himself, is to weaken dangerously the foundations of Theism, and that a clear and strong belief in Theism seems to require us to suppose that there was a time when not as yet had God created any universe. Such speculation is indeed adventurous, and challenges the rebuke that we are judging in realms in which we are not strong enough to judge. But taking our faculties as they are, I agree with you that strenuous believers in God are well-nigh compelled to think that there was a time when his creative Will had not yet put forth a universe.

But do you not believe that to the consciousness of God the past and the future are as vividly apprehended as the present moment? Do you not believe that to him yesterday is as clear-cut as to-day, and to-morrow as clear-cut as yesterday? He is no purblind creature creeping along from hour to hour, dependent for knowledge of the past on a memory about which hang the heavy fogs of forgetfulness, or for knowledge of the future on the hazard of guess and speculation. To him surely it is all one eternal moment, neither past nor future shadowed by clouds of impenetrable darkness. And therefore, before ever the universe was, according to human ways of computing, it was as present as it is to-day to his apprehension. It was there in thought even as it has been and is and shall be in the human centuries, and all the wealth of his love could go out to it even as it does this day. So that to him there was no need of other object for his love, since to him the universe indeed was eternally present, though to our modes of apprehension it had yet to begin to be and was hidden in the womb of time.

II. But the other great focal idea which characterises your letter is this: that the perfection of the moral and spiritual character of Jesus Christ was so absolute and so unparalleled that it cannot be accounted for under the ordinary laws and conditions of humanity, but involves a pouring of the Eternal Word into him with a completeness entirely unique, and described by you as other than inspiration and only to be adequately defined as incarnation—the fusing of the Eternal Word—an element of God—in the man Jesus, so that his humanity was exalted to divinity or deity.

This position of yours seems to me to rest on three assumptions, not one of which

* This article appears in the December number of the Seed Sower, and we are indebted to the kindness of the Editor of that magazine for permission to reproduce it in these columns.—ED. INQ.

I can myself allow. These assumptions are, first, the exceeding faultiness of every other son of man who has ever lived, the sublimest prophet no less than the ordinary worldling; secondly, the transcendency of the goodness of Jesus, exalting him to a rank entirely separate from all the rest of the human race; thirdly, the inadequacy of the ordinary spiritual laws to bring forth so unique a character.

Now I believe that I am not at all behind you in my love and reverence for, or my spiritual appreciation of, Jesus Christ; and I am quite certain that your distinguished friend and correspondent was not behind you in these things. Yet I cannot admit any one of your three assumptions.

1. First, in regard to your depreciation of all others the best and purest of our race. You write these words: "In every other prophet of humanity we detect the presence of innumerable flaws, moral chasms, breaks of sympathy, provincialisms, inconsistencies, bias, &c." This, you will admit, is a most grave and sweeping charge; to me it is indeed a startling one. I am sure you find no pleasure in making it, and would not make it save after severe investigation. You are doubtless ready with your evidence. I will, however, content myself with asking you to point out "the innumerable flaws and breaks of sympathy" in Sakyamuni, whom men call the Buddha; and to go to quite another sphere, "the innumerable flaws and moral chasms" in Alfred, maker of England. One exception to your generalisation would break down your argument. I have pretty closely studied what is known of these two sons of men. I have failed, and thousands of other students have also failed, to detect the "innumerable flaws" of which you speak. It is necessary to your argument that you should point them out. Meanwhile, I hold by the belief that these two spirits at least were so pure and noble, so selfless in their spirit of service and their love of men, that your statement cannot escape the charge of libel.

2. Your second assumption is the transcendency of the goodness of Jesus, exalting him to a rank entirely separate from all the rest of the human race. Now, I sometimes think that this fencing off of Jesus into a class alone has done more than any other cause to breed the spirit of revolt against his spiritual leadership and moral captaincy. He does not need this safeguarding; and his quality will have more attractive power and transforming efficacy on others if you leave him there among the great sons of history to assert his own hegemony by the native power of his manhood. But as for the fact itself, I find his goodness to be all of the same quality as that which we most revere and love in other men, an ideal for us all, and not of a make and pattern to be segregated from the great mass of ethical and spiritual force energising, now with ebb and now with flow of power, through the age-long evolution of human history.

Do you not, my dear sir, in spite of your honest efforts to empty yourself of bias, bring to the perusal of the Gospels a different method of criticism from that which you apply to other records of exalted humanity? As you yourself find in every other biography "innumerable flaws, moral chasms, breaks of sympathy," might not one approaching the Gospels in the same frame of mind in which you have approached these others, perhaps find some shadow in the cursing of the fig-tree or the destruction of the Gadarene swine, in the awful vehemence of denunciation levelled against a whole order of men high in the religious regard of Israel, in the dramatic action with the whip of small chords in the Temple Court? You will say, and justly say, that such criticisms would betray either an uncritical literalism in accepting incidents or a lack of that sympathetic insight which alone can measure a sublime and radiant character. But, if so, must we not suppose in your methods the like defect when you draw such unfavourable conclusions concerning all other bright and particular stars of the human race?

But you tell us that you find throughout the Gospels, even in the parables themselves, a consciousness of authority and an assumption of moral prerogative which would be offensive unless it came from one conscious of that unique incarnation of God which you allege. But surely a man filled with the consciousness of God, with the certainty of the truth which he proclaims, with assurance of the healing and saving power of that temper of sonship to God into which Jesus has won his way, may and must speak with an intensity of assertion which to the unsympathetic might seem presumptuous, even though he draw his conviction and his authority from no other sources than those which God everywhere opens to the pure in heart. You plead that you do not "exaggerate the elevation, the loveliness, and the perfect moral sympathy and unapproachable grandeur of this life." I do not think that you do exaggerate its "elevation and loveliness"—rather that you somewhat distort and misinterpret them. And his "unapproachableness" you do not, it seems to me, so much "exaggerate" as assume on evidence that is inadequate.

3. But let us finally proceed to the connection which you endeavour to establish between the existence of the Eternal Word within the personality of God and the perfection of the man Jesus Christ. I understand you to believe that that perfection was brought about by the inflow of the Eternal Word into the person of Jesus till he became himself "the express image" of God. In one place, I observe, you write that you "see no difference in kind, but only in degree" in the union of the divine and the human in Jesus and in other men. But that concession hardly seems to have much significance, inasmuch as you afterwards throw your whole force into the contention that "inspiration, the inspiration of the divine essence visiting the soul of Jesus, and filling it without measure" does not suffice to account for "all the uniqueness" you witness in his life.

You say that "we have no evidence that the inspiration which lifts men to the higher levels of insight and attainment—all inferior to his—is competent to the larger task of perfecting an individual." And therefore you reject the term "inspiration" as describing the action of the Spirit of God on the soul of Jesus, and adopt instead the word "incarnation." You reserve the word "incarnation" for Jesus only, thus cutting yourself off, I incidentally observe, from using the language of that very popular school of theology amongst us now which speaks of the incarnation of God in all good and holy men.

As for you, you lay down an emphatic distinction between inspiration and incarnation: inspiration for others; incarnation for Jesus. But I could wish that you had more clearly defined what that distinction is, how we are to discriminate between the two. "Inspiration" means literally "breathing in." "Incarnation" means "enfleshing." Both are metaphors from the physical; but the former seems the more comely word for a spiritual idea. However, you insist that in Jesus's case it is incarnation; and you insist on it on the ground that we have no evidence that inspiration would suffice.

I reply that, on the other hand, we have and can have no evidence that inspiration would not suffice. Who is to put a measure to the power of the Spirit of God? If we see his inspiration transforming an Augustine from a reckless sensualist to a spiritual saint, who is to say it can go no further? What can be more arbitrary than thus to limit its efficacy and shut it out from capacity to lift men up to be veritable sons of God? You first put an artificial chasm between the goodness of the best and the goodness of Jesus; and then you say that you must have quite a different process to produce the second from that which creates the first.

And to what end such distinction? If all that is open to us is inspiration, but incarnation—a greater thing—was given to Jesus; then where is our pattern, our example, our brother, the man of like nature with ourselves calling us up to be like to him, to be sons of God with him? Nay, let us trust the divine inbreathing—that great hallowing energy from God which men have named inspiration. Let us believe that it is open to every sincere and humble soul. And taking the hand of Jesus, our brother—our captain, too, yet of our flesh and our spirit—let us move on through the eternity that stretches before us till we too, by God's grace, win our Christhood, our perfect sonship to the Father.

Believe me, dear Professor Knight,
With the most sincere respect,
Very faithfully yours,
RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.—The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie has received the following additional donations towards the cost of erecting the new Unitarian Church at Auckland, New Zealand:—Anonymous, 10s. (making 20s.); Rev. J. E. Carpenter, £1 1s.; Miss S. S. Dowson, £3; Sir E. Durning Lawrence, £5 5s.; from a Friend, £5; Mr. J. Kennedy, £1; Mr. James Laycock, £1; Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, £5; Mr. J. Ellis Mace, £1; Mr. David Martineau, £2; Mr. H. J. Morton, £2; Mr. Stanton W. Preston, £5; Mr. Ion Pritchard, £5; Mr. W. Spiller, £5 5s. Including the £50 voted by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the sum of £306 1s. has been subscribed by the Mother Country, and the whole amount has now been forwarded to the Treasurer of the Building Fund at Auckland.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

LITERATURE.

MATTHEW HENRY AND HIS CHAPEL.*

MR. ROBERTS, who until recently was minister of Matthew Henry's Chapel at Chester, is to be congratulated on the completion of his bi-centenary history. It is a book rich in old Nonconformist lore, containing much original matter now for the first time published from the old MSS., and there are a number of interesting illustrations. We are glad to see the list of nearly 150 subscribers to the volume, but there must be many more lovers of the cause and students of Nonconformist history who will wish to add this new book to their store.

The foundation of the chapel was laid in September, 1699, and in August, 1700, after having occupied an earlier chapel for thirteen years, Matthew Henry and his congregation entered upon their new possession; but when the present congregation began to think of the bi-centenary celebration, they found that first their old building must be thoroughly renovated. Towards this end the essential things were done at a cost of £700, with admirable results, but leaving still more to be desired, and the celebration was happily held in October of last year. As a contribution towards the cost, as well as for the work's sake, Mr. Roberts undertook the preparation of his history; and while we fear that the book, with its wealth of material, has proved too costly to be of much financial gain to the old chapel, it certainly deserves for this reason, as for its own intrinsic worth, a generous welcome.

Matthew Henry himself, known to the world as a pious commentator and by former generations very widely read, naturally occupies a much larger place in Mr. Roberts's book, than the chapel of which he was the first and most distinguished minister. Indeed, the actual records of the chapel are very meagre, and the story has in many places to be filled in from what is known of contemporary Nonconformist history.

But first we have two most interesting chapters on Matthew's father, Philip Henry, a favourite pupil of Dr. Busby's at Westminster, a student of Christ Church, Oxford, in the time of the civil war, who as a young man witnessed the execution of Charles I., one of the ejected of 1662, and the one man, apparently for whom the brutal Jeffreys showed some consideration. One quaint passage from Philip Henry's record of his school days we will quote. Mr. Roberts prints the spelling and the contractions of the original, but we will modernise it here:—

> The usual severities of the school I had but small share of, while I was in it. Once being monitor of the chamber and being sent forth to seek one that played truant (it was Nath. Bul, afterwards a Master of Paul's School), I found him out where he had hid himself, and at his earnest request promised him I would make excuse for him, and say I could not find him, which I wickedly did; the next morning being examined by Mr. Busby, where he was, and whether he saw me, he said, yes, he did; at which I remember Mr. Busby turned his eye towards me and said και συ τέκνον! and whipt me, which was the only time I ever felt the weight of his hand, and I deserved it; he appointed me also a penitential copy of Latin verses, which I made and brought him, and then he gave me sixpence and received me again into his favour.

In September, 1657, Philip Henry received Presbyterian ordination and became minister at Worthenbury, in Shropshire. There he remained until Bartholomew's Day, 1662, when he retired to Broad Oak, his wife's inheritance, near Whitchurch, which remained his home until his death in 1696. At Broad Oak Matthew was born in October, 1662. Thus father and son lived together through the troubled times of persecution, and Philip Henry was not a stranger to the inside of Chester Gaol. Some notes of his "concerning the taking away of Penal laws and tests," Mr. Roberts prints for the first time. The following is one of the notes:—

> Quaer.—Whether there be not two Churches of England, one built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the Chief Corner Stone, and another built upon the foundation of Penal laws and statutes, the Act of Uniformity being the chief corner stone. The former holding and asserting all the great Truths of the Gospel contained in their Doctrinal Articles which are great and able to defend themselves according to the Scriptures, the other urging and insisting upon a parcel of unnecessary forms and ceremonies contained in their rubrics and canons which are weak and unable to defend themselves without the aid and assistance of fines and imprisonments; and whether the former being of God shall not certainly stand and the latter being of men shall not certainly fall.

In telling of Matthew Henry's early life, Mr. Roberts prints a number of family letters, and also a long record of events in London, which he sent home while he was studying at Gray's Inn in 1685-6. Those were troubled times, and in one place he writes:—

> I was very glad to understand that last Thursday, Nov. 5, the London ministers preached so much against Popery as Dr. Sherlock, &c. I heard Dr. Stillingfleet's lecture on Exodus xv. 9, 10. Bonfires were prohibited here, an order of King and Council being published that no bonfires should be made at any time without the King's express order. But if we may have good fires in the chimney and none in Smithfield we shall do pretty well.

Matthew had been sent to London in the first instance to be educated for the ministry, in the house of a Nonconformist minister, but when the growing stringency of the laws against Dissenters seemed to effectually bar such a career, he was entered at Gray's Inn. Then came first James II.'s irregular toleration, and soon after, the Revolution and the period of Nonconformist chapel building, so that the way opened for Matthew Henry's prosperous ministry at Chester. In May, 1687, he was privately ordained in London, having been asked to settle at Chester, and from that time until 1712 he ministered there. Only after much hesitation he was induced in that year to remove to Hackney, and in 1714 he died at Nantwich, on his way to revisit his old congregation.

We have been tempted to linger over these earliest records, and must only very briefly refer to the rest of Mr. Roberts's work. The first three ministers at Chester occupied the pulpit for 111 years in all, during which period, unhampered by any doctrinal Trust the congregation departed from the Calvinism of their first teacher to doctrine which, at the beginning of last century, had become distinctly Unitarian. This progress Mr. Roberts illustrates from the contemporary history, with references to Mr. Lloyd's drastic treatment of "The Presbyterians" and "The Open Trust Myth," for which the curious must refer to the book itself.

The chapter on the "Secession" of 1769 is a real contribution to the history, which should be carefully noted. In that year the Rev. Joseph Jenkins, described as Baptist minister at Wrexham, came to Chester and became the first minister of an Independent church in that city. It is commonly held that he came at the call of a body which had separated from the congregation at Matthew Henry's Chapel, and a recent historian has stated in so many words:

> A deputation from Chester waited upon him to preach for the friends at Chester, who had separated from Crook-street congregation.

Mr. Jenkins himself, on the contrary, in a letter dated Sept. 24, 1773, explaining the circumstances of his settlement at Chester writes:—

> I asked again whether they intended to make a party and separate from Mr. Chidlaw (the minister at Crook-street), for that neither my character, connections, or inclination would permit me to be concerned in an affair of that nature. The answer was clearly in the negative. I am, said Mr. Dix (one of the two who, with Mr. Holland, formed the deputation), no member of the chapel—I am a member of the late Dr. Watts's Church. I am only a hearer and occasional communicant at the chapel, and have been long dissatisfied with the young preachers from Warrington who supplied during Mr. Chidlaw's illness. He said, moreover, that he was of the orthodox sentiments and wished to hear me again. Mr. Holland said that he was a member of Mr. Thomas's Church at Bristol and only a hearer at the chapel, and that they were deputed to speak to me by several other persons, partly Baptists, and partly Methodists, who had been in connection with Mr. Westley, but were now dissatisfied.

As a matter of fact there seems to have been nothing at that time that can be dignified by the name of a "secession" from Matthew Henry's Chapel.

The minister of the chapel at the time of the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Act in 1844 was the Rev. Mortimer Maurice, and Mr. Roberts quotes some passages of a sermon of his, preached July 28 of that year, after the passing of the Act. Having spoken of the progress of their thought in matters of religion and the liberty which justified it, the preacher said:—

> We set a high value upon our Unitarian views and sentiments, but we value the principles of Christian Liberty more. We would leave the deep things of God to be examined by the impartial judgment of after generations, and we could not presume to bias that judgment by availing ourselves of the principles of law and property to perpetuate our characteristic opinion. And this we would abstain from doing, through a firm faith in an over-ruling Providence, and from a thorough conviction that whatever changes he ordains or permits in human opinion will be made to produce ultimate good.

And, in conclusion, Maurice quotes from the sermon delivered by Matthew Henry at the opening of the chapel:—

> We are far from engrossing religion and the Church to ourselves and those of our own way, or thinking that we are the only elect people of God; from our hearts we abhor and renounce all such narrow principles as are contrary to Catholic Christianity and undermine its sure and large foundations.

The first three ministers of Matthew Henry's Chapel served altogether, as we have already noted, for 111 years. Their successors during the next 102 years number ten, of whom the longest in the service was the Rev. J. K. Montgomery (1860-1896), still happily a member of his old congregation. Having given a brief chronicle of these later ministries, Mr. Roberts, in a concluding chapter, reprints THE INQUIRER's report of the Bicentenary celebrations, and adds to the interest and value of his book by appending a number of lists of subscribers, trustees, communicants, &c., giving also particulars of the various chapel trusts.

We heartily re-echo the wish with which Mr. Roberts concludes his Preface—prompted by a sense of what he has learnt in the preparation of this book, and of how much more there is yet to learn—that our two chief authorities on Nonconformist history, the Revs. Alexander Gordon and J. Edwin Odgers, would give us "at least a series of essays on leading points in the development of religious liberty."

VOICES OF NATURE.*

SURELY there never was a time when the methods and revelations of Nature were more eagerly studied than in these days. The impetus given to the study by devoted observers at the middle and end of the nineteenth century—men who went straight to Nature to ascertain at first hand the methods and laws she observes in her infinite diversity of operations—seems not to have been all spent and exhausted in their own day. Rather has it increased both in volume and in intensity, and where there were, then, individuals and groups of two or three, slowly and quietly working along their special lines of research, there are now hundreds, even thousands, who, inspired by their devotion, have eagerly entered into their labours, and who with spectroscope and camera, with microscope and test-tube, with geological hammer and deep-sea dredge, are ceaselessly busy adding to the record of observed facts. And always we see how true it is that "well begun is half done." The pioneer—to whom be all honour—makes those first steps along the hitherto untrodden path which cost so much, but which, with all they demand of tireless devotion, are so well worth the making. Gratefully men follow along the path he has indicated—the path which leads to fuller appreciation of the wonders, the beauties, and the prophetic meanings of the life that now is.

And such a pioneer, of whom we English folk are now proud, was Charles Darwin. It is a noteworthy fact that so great has become the demand for popular accounts of what Darwin did, and of the theories which he propounded, that the associations and societies whose business it is to provide religious literature for the general reader have found it expedient and necessary to respond to the demand of their clients for introductions and text-books dealing with "Darwinism" and with other subsequent developments of his theories on the Science of Life.

It is to the credit of these societies for providing religious literature that they have so fully responded to a demand which asks at once for scientific and religious knowledge.

And our own associations have not been backward in this respect; indeed, to whom if not to us pertain the duty and privilege of showing, not merely that science is handmaid of religion, but rather that science is twin-sister to religion.

It is with these considerations in mind that we offer our congratulations to Miss Caroline A. Martineau on the way in which she has dealt with her subject in her little book "Voices of Nature," and to the Sunday School Association for having published the book, and to ourselves the readers who may, at so small an outlay, obtain and read the well-written series of nine lessons therein contained, on what Nature has to tell concerning the world in which we live, and the way in which life-forms are evolved.

It is our privilege, having been asked to notice the book, to express one regret as well as great appreciation. That regret is that the book was not more profusely illustrated.

Illustration in these days is comparatively cheap, and whilst many books are published which, perhaps, owe all their excellence to good illustration, it seems to us rather to be deplored that such good matter as that which Miss Martineau gives us should have been rather meagrely illustrated. The text, to be sure, is of a nature to carry the reader easily and eagerly on from page to page, but for young folk (and as the Sunday School Association publishes the book, we presume that young folk are first in order of importance) a greater profusion of illustrations and diagrams would have been an improvement.

The first six lessons deal with subjects likely to interest the middle and upper classes in our schools.

No. I. "A Lesson Written in Chalk" is an introduction to geology, and leads the young reader to think out for him or herself the reasons for the appearance of marine shells in bed of chalk far from the sea.

Nos. II. and III. "Flowers and their Friends" will delight all lovers of spring-tide flowers and their servants, the winged insects.

No. IV. "No Waste in Nature" is at the same time a lesson in chemistry and a moral lesson on true economy. The moral element in this lesson preponderates, but is never allowed to become prosy or wearisome. Indeed, throughout the whole book the skilful interweaving of the moral drawn from Nature constitutes its pre-eminent charm.

Nos. V. and VI. "How Work Is Done" and "The Reward of Work" are both treated in a way which elucidates mechanical laws and brings out the value of earnest purposeful living.

There is a marked advance in subject matter and style of treatment in the last three sections, which deal with the doctrines of "Darwinism" with great clearness. The object of the writer has been to explain, in simple language, the teachings of Darwin, along with such modifications as have been found necessary since the great pioneer passed away. Whilst the former sections are fitted if used by teacher or parent to evoke the interest of the young folk, the last three will be found intensely interesting to members of elder classes, teachers and parents. Of these three the first, No. VII., deals with the "Struggle for Existence" and "Survival of the Fittest," and provides good reading and food for reflection. It also leads on to the subject dealt with in No. VIII. "Mutual Helpfulness in Nature." In this chapter Miss Martineau deals with the objection raised by tender-hearted folk that "Darwin's teachings imply the advantage of selfishness, or, at all events, the triumph of strength over weakness." She points out, with examples, that the fittest to survive is not necessarily the strongest or even the cleverest. Fitness often includes other and nobler qualities. This opens up the question as to what fitness really involves.

At the conclusion is the following passage:—

> The fittest to survive may be, and in many instances are, not the strongest and best able to fight their own battles, but those which are of most service to others. A single unselfish man or woman living among others who are selfish may, no doubt, be at a disadvantage to some extent and for a time; but a community of unselfish men and women would, in the long run, get on much better than society as we find it now, and I can see nothing in Darwin's teachings to make one think otherwise.

The concluding chapter deals with "Natural Beauty," and gives instances of its use to its possessor. It is full of suggestion for thought—the more so as the subject is one on which it is possible to hold very divergent opinions.

The book is neatly bound, and, for the size, contains a large amount of reliable information in very readable form. It should be a welcome addition to the class-books in our Sunday-schools.

SHORT NOTICES.

DR. JOHN HUNTER, until recently minister of Trinity Church, Glasgow, has marked his settlement at the King's Weigh House Church, Grosvenor-square, by bringing out a new and greatly improved edition of his Devotional Services for Public Worship. The first edition of this book was published in 1880, and through successive editions, to this the seventh, it has grown not only in size but in the completeness and fitness of the help it offers for reverent congregational worship. Dr. Hunter's ideal has always been to unite the free utterance of the minister with a liturgical service in which the congregation shall take a large part, and the difficulty in previous editions of the book of a number of scattered portions of service, from which selection had on each occasion to be made, has now been overcome by arranging a number of complete services. Even those who could not statedly use this book for common worship will find it a most welcome addition to their library of devotion. Many will welcome also the addition of a table of Scripture lessons. (James Maclehose and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

Mrs. Tileston's little book of "Daily Strength for Daily Needs" has long been our classic among such collections for daily devotional reading, as her selections of poetry in "Quiet Hours," "Sunshine in the Soul," and "Tender and True" are also among the best of their kind. More recently we received from the same hand a little book of selected prayers gathered from writers as far apart as Augustine and Christina Rossetti, "Great Souls at Prayer," and now we have to welcome a second book of daily readings, Joy and Strength for the Pilgrim's Day, "a selection from writers of many countries and centuries of thoughts of courage, faith, hope, and love, to cheer and inspirit the pilgrim in his daily journey, whether it be in clouds or sunshine, and to remind him of what he can do to help his fellow-travellers." Judging from the number of extracts taken from each author, Fénélon and Pusey are still among Mrs. Tileston's favourites, and with them Mrs, Sidney Lear holds the first place. Emerson and Thom are hardly represented, and Martineau and Marcus Aurelius not at all, although they furnished much for "Daily strength." On the other hand, Canon Carter and Archbishop Temple rank high in the new book. It is needless to assure our readers that the selections, both of prose and verse, are made with fine feeling and true insight, and that the book is beautiful both in form and substance. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)

Very different from Mrs. Tileston's is another book of daily readings, The Garden of Life: Flowers of Thought on Culture, Conduct, and Character for Every Day in the Year, gathered and arranged by H. W. Smith. The author calls them flowers, but very many of them would be better described as herbs or useful vegetables. The selections are, for the most part, very modern, from well-known and little-known writers—even anonymous extracts from newspapers and magazines are included—with abundant food for thought and nourishing moral sentiments. It is a book of ethical instruction, but with little, so far as we have been able to see, touching upon the finer graces of life or its deeper spiritual experiences. Instead of the text, which is generally found in such books at the head of a page, there is the name of an author, by no means always the author from whom a selection follows, with dates, and a line or two as to his writings and character. Mr. Smith has published two other anthologies, "Modern Thoughts on Life and Conduct" and "Modern Thoughts on Religion and Culture." In this new book he presents us with his portrait. (Williams and Norgate. 5s. net.)

The annual volumes of Good Words and the Sunday Magazine are always welcome for their good store of pictures and wholesome reading. Throughout the former volume Neil Munro's "Shoes of Fortune" run, and among the biographical articles are four on "Celebrated Lady Travellers," of which that on Mary Kingsley is by Miss Toulmin Smith. The memorial article on Queen Victoria is written by the Editor, who, like his late brother Norman Macleod, was one of her chaplains. Interesting features in the Sunday Magazine are a series of papers on "Noble Women of our Time," including Mrs. Sidney Lear, Mrs. Nassau Senior and Miss Agnes Jones, who did so much for nursing in the workhouse infirmary at Liverpool; and six papers on "Respectable Sins," by Dr. J. Watson. (Isbister and Co. 7s. 6d. each.)

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Visit to a School for Deaf and Dumb Children in Switzerland.

It is very wonderful how much can be done for children who are deaf and dumb. Although they cannot hear any sound, they are taught by watching the lips of the teacher to see how words are made, and so to speak themselves, and at the same time to read and write, so that they can enjoy books just as we do. It is like taking a poor prisoner, shut up in a narrow dungeon, where there is nothing to interest and nothing for him to do, and setting him free in a great and beautiful world, to live and be happy with his fellow-men.

It is not easy to understand how the deaf and dumb learn to talk and to understand, but I think you will be interested in this account of a visit to one of the schools for such children.

My son and his wife, while staying at Sierre, in the canton of Valais, paid an interesting visit to the old monastery of La Géronde, which has now been converted into a school for deaf and dumb children (sourds muets). The chaplain, who is called le recteur, received the party, took them into the schoolroom of the youngest class, and left them there. An extremely bright Sister was teaching here, and she had two sections to teach—some who had only been eight weeks at the school, and some longer. About six, all Germans, had been there only eight weeks, and they were first inspected. The pupils learn entirely by watching the teacher's mouth, or, in some cases, she puts their hands under her chin, and they recognise the word from the vibration. When the children could only say single words, she had always an object or a picture for the child to point to, so that it knew what it was talking about. A few made sounds (letters) only, and they could all run to the blackboard and write the letter, or the word, or the sentence, as it happened. (The writing and spelling throughout the school is marvellous, by the by.) The more advanced section (mostly French) understood more, and some answered her questions quickly. It was a joy to see and hear the little teacher; she was so bright, and they were evidently so fond of her.

The next two classes, also under one Sister, were then visited—mostly French, and about twelve altogether. Some looked very bright, and all laughed and seemed alive and well. They keep their eyes riveted on the teacher in a pathetic way. There was no parrot-like repetition of poetry. She asked them questions about what they had seen out of doors, and their answers showed reflection. Some voices were painful to listen to, but others were clear and almost normal. The older part answered questions on a story told them on Sunday about St. Bernard. The Sister mentioned that she often takes the children for a walk, and talks to them about what they see (cows, &c.). When they come in they rest for half an hour, and then write down what they recollect. The teaching about the creation was old-fashioned—sun created on the third day, plants on the fourth, &c.—but to have got into these poor locked-up brains an idea of God and of His marvellous creation is something. It is believed that unless thus rescued those born deaf-mute may grow into "crétins"—a sad form of scarcely human idiocy, arising not from want of brain-power, but of means of communicating with their fellow-creatures.

The visitors now followed all the forty-four children into the chapel for ten minutes' prayer. They divided, French on one side and Germans on the other. A Sister repeated "Our Father" in German, and all the German children said it after her. Then she crossed over to the other side of the chapel and repeated the same prayer in French for the French children. It sounded uncouth but (says one) it was hard to keep one's eyes dry. There was something so affectionate, so infinitely strenuous and appealing about these children, and such intelligence dawning in some eyes. There were a few invocations of saints, and then the children came out, in perfect order, and reverently keeping their little hands folded all the while, for a meal.

Then the top class of all was visited. Its pupils did some geography, and a French section of them French verbs. It was observed that the teacher made them find out for themselves whatever they can, and herself never degenerated into a mere "instruction-jug" (for pouring out facts, &c.). The children did a good deal of blackboard writing themselves, and the teachers very little, except correcting their work.

This way of teaching is far better than the old way by which deaf people used to be taught to talk with their hands, making different signs for each letter, and it is now used all over the world. Hundreds, even thousands of children, who without it would have had very sad and lonely lives, are now able to learn many things, and grow up to be helpful and happy men and women.

RECONCILIATION.

WE referred in a recent article to a paper on "The Minister's Adjustment to the New Conditions," read by the Rev. WILLIAM C. GANNETT to the American National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, and we wish now to call the attention of our readers to another striking utterance of his, which has deservedly been widely read, and which contains lessons good for us to ponder, as bearing upon the conditions of religious life in this country hardly less directly than in the churches of America. The sermon to which we refer is entitled "The New Orthodoxy, the New Unitarianism, and the New Universalism, should they be Three or One?" It was first preached, in substance, Mr. GANNETT says, in a brief preface, at the installation of the Rev. PAUL FROTHINGHAM as minister of the Arlington-street Church in Boston, in October of last year, the church of which CHANNING and the preacher's father, EZRA STILES GANNETT, were ministers. "The sermon was an expression of hope that CHANNING'S Church might lead in the movement for Fellowship, even as it once did in the movement for Freedom, in religion." It was also given as an address last summer to the New York State Conference of Religion at Buffalo, and again, somewhat recast, Mr. GANNETT preached it on the twelfth anniversary of his settlement with his present congregation at Rochester, New York.

There is, Mr. GANNETT says, undoubtedly a "New Orthodoxy." Modification is acknowledged by the staunchest Conservatives. Frank criticism and repudiation of creeds are rife. Half the Unitarian ministers in America probably come from Orthodox homes and many from Orthodox pulpits, with but little return-migration; but still more significant is the constant attempt of those who do not think of migration, to restate the old truths of Christianity in terms which the mind, heart, and conscience of to-day can accept. As to the books of these new teachers, which are already a goodly number, "There may be mist in their thought and a blurring of phrase in their pages, but what yearnings for the new erections of faith which shall take the place of the old now falling in ruin! And each new book of the kind distances the last in jubilant gladness for escape from that ruin. . . . It is true, of course, that the large masses of Orthodoxy drag behind; but true, also, that the heresy line is constantly shifting, and always in one direction. Yesterday's panic positions are to-day's permitted positions, and to-morrow's platitudes. Liberal Christianity is found in solution, if not in crystallised form, is found budding, if not flowering, in all the Orthodoxies to-day." And at the same time a new Unitarianism and a new Universalism have naturally moved forward also, under the same influences, to new conceptions of religious truth. Should they be three or one? Mr. GANNETT asks; and his conviction is that "Reconciliation should be the key-note of twentieth-century religion."

When we think of these beautiful expansions of the old dogmas of Christendom so fast emerging of late in the churches around us, does it not seem as if we were entering upon the Liberal Orthodox Age? Liberal Orthodoxy is going to be a vastly larger body and force than its Come-outers. In the great seasons of history "Unitarianism" and "Universalism" will by and by be recognised as premature forms of Liberal Orthodoxy; and this last, as we know it to-day, as but a primitive form of the great Liberal movement within Christianity. Orthodoxy is bound to grow more and more liberal. It will become, as it much needs to become, more honest, more bravely outspoken, less afraid to identify its cause with the cause of its heretic. But I think the word will not be, "This is Unitarianism" or "Universalism," but rather "Unitarianism, Universalism, is this."

How these movements will actually work out in the future developments of Church life we cannot now forecast. It may be the destiny of Unitarians to be always in the van-guard, pioneers of progressive religious life, or possibly in other Churches the true pioneers of the future will arise. In any case it must be their aim that theirs shall always be Churches of the Spirit, whether well or ill spoken of, whether still isolated or merged in a larger Catholic Church, always true to their ideal, and doing the self-forgetful work for religion, for mankind, to which they are called.

Outward and practical unity for the different Churches is not to be looked for in any near future, and the prospect of it is far more distant in this country even than in America; but for unity of spirit and a common purpose much can already be done.

Plans of union, its conditions, its name, and the like, are, if at all, for the morrows to settle. Now is the acceptable time for the simple drawing together of the half-hostile churches in conscious and open friendliness. The unity for to-day lies in glad recognitions of spiritual fellowship, in welcomed communions of worship, in confessed similarities of attitude before the mystery of the Universe and the needs of man, and in the joining of hands to minister to some of those tragic needs. These things are possible now. Union to this extent could be brought about this very season in many a spot in our lands—and the angels in heaven would rejoice!

For oh, the need, the need of the Reconciliation! The world needs it so much in these days of what seems like a declining moral ideal among the civilised nations, that it behoves all ministers, all laymen, to study the problems of Reconciliation in religion as an economy, as a new discipline. The might of a Reconciled Church to achieve good for man! The things that are waiting to be done until earnest men of varying faiths are willing to join with each other, head, heart, and hand, to accomplish them!

But, if I mistake not, a beautiful outlook opens before us. It is not a question whether the Reconciliation will come, and the things be done, and the wrongs be righted; but when it will come, how long it will delay. That time-question lays duty on you and on me. The New Orthodoxy, the New Unitarianism, the New Universalism, yes, and the New Judaism, and the new and reverent Agnosticism—they ought not to be much longer separate, many. They ought soon to be one. Twenty-five years of this twentieth century, ten years of it, with aimed endeavour, and with humility and religiousness in the endeavourers, might work wonders of Reconciliation.

To this appeal of Mr. GANNETT'S a cordial response has been made by Dr. WASHINGTON GLADDEN, one of the best known of the liberal leaders of thought among the Orthodox Churches in America. In the Christian World of Nov. 14 there appeared a short article on "Religion in America," over the familiar initials of Dr. WHITON, telling of Mr. GANNETT'S sermon (though his name, unfortunately, was misspelt) and then describing the response in the following terms :—

This remarkable address Dr. Washington Gladden made the subject of a sermon last month to his own congregation on "The New Orthodoxy and the New Liberalism," in the course of which he said: "Has not this Liberal, putting away the spirit of the disputer, the caviller and the denier, and turning with open face and loving mind to look with us upon the things that are precious to us, really seen into the heart of them? . . . Is not his faith essentially the same as ours? . . . How does it make you feel, my brethren, to hear yourselves hailed across the line by a voice like that? It is like the Germans playing the "Marseillaise" and the French cheering them. . . . If we all with the same openness of mind, the same largeness of sympathy, the same eagerness to find in the beliefs of others the values that they find in them, would study the religious theories of those with whom we suppose ourselves to differ, how soon would reconciliation come."

The representative character of these two speakers, generally recognised by all who know them as standing for what is best in the groups to which they belong, cannot be questioned. That the concordant views they hold, and the one spirit in which they hold them, are not as yet universally held among those who are classed with them in ecclesiastical lists is quite true. But it may be believed that when the old chasm between the two parties is so far narrowed that leaders can thus clasp hands across it, it is in a fair way to be closed up in a practical recognition of the spiritual fact that religion unites those whom theology divides.

In former generations, Mr. GANNETT points out, Unitarians were called to vindicate two supreme truths — the goodness of GOD, and man's right to the free use of his reason and conscience in religion; but even while they were maintaining their distinctive doctrines against the Trinitarian and the Calvinist, they were doing something even more important, "they were keeping open the road of the soul for advance in whatever direction the Spirit of God might lead. They were the spiritual descendants of LUTHER—of LUTHER the young and protesting, not LUTHER the old and affrighted; the continuators of the interior protest in Protestantism, the defenders of the disowned and vilified essence of the whole Protestant movement." And we can only be thankful if now we find teachers in other Churches at last ready to follow out consistently the great principles of their Protestantism.

The modern liberal movement, whether among Unitarians or the New Orthodox, is marked by the "domination of doctrine by Principles."

Freedom the method in religion, in place of authority and tradition; Fellowship the spirit in religion, in place of sectarianism; Character the test in religion, instead of ritual or creed; and Salvation of Others the aim in religion, instead of salvation of self—these are not "doctrines" about God or Christ or the Bible or life after death; they are intellectual and moral "principles." The distinction is not exact, but is plain enough. They are the Four Great Principles of the Liberal Faith, which are beginning to dominate doctrines in the churches of Christendom. They are familiar to Unitarians, our old characteristic emphases. But to-day three of the four—exception as yet must be made of the second—are emphasised no more strongly by us than by many an eloquent voice in the Orthodox churches. They are the principles shared by all Liberals, whatever their church be called. To hold them supreme in religion makes one a "Liberal," whether he be a Jew or Christian, whether Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Baptist, or Methodist. Here, indeed, is the open gate for the ministry of Reconciliation. Here is Reconciliation already in large measure. And it is mainly a growth of this last generation.

As to actual unity of doctrine, in the great truths of the Fatherhood of GOD, the divine sonship of Man, the true humanity of JESUS, the application of the principles of ethics to the relations of Man to GOD, both here and hereafter, what the New Orthodoxy teaches is, with two notable exceptions, what Mr. CHADWICK has aptly described as "just Unitarianism or Universalism with the copyright run out." And as to these two exceptions, so greatly emphasised by the New Orthodoxy, Mr. GANNETT has this significant passage:—

The New Orthodoxy is "Christo-centric." Is it not true that the more "Christo-centric" it becomes, that is, the more "Christ" becomes to it the symbol of the All-Creative, Immanent Power, operating in physical Nature, in History, and in the personal Soul, so much the more the difference between this Christ and the Being whom we call "Our Father" reduces itself to a difference of name? Should difference in name, in symbol, work divorce in religion? There are Trinities, if one value such computation and term, which all of us can believe in, and all of us do. At the same time this centric Christ of the New Orthodoxy is increasingly human. There is no doubt of that. Our alien emphasis on the "humanity of Christ" is one of the contributions for which gratitude is specifically lavished upon us. The Liberal Orthodox mind reckons divinity in terms of humanity just as Unitarians do, for the human mind cannot do otherwise; but it is the increasing delight of the New Orthodoxy to do this with reference to Christ.—Now from our side: shallow in mind and contracted of heart is that Unitarian or Universalist who does not increasingly recognise "Incarnation" as one of the supreme words of religion, ranking next to "God" itself in majesty of significance. Are we evolutionists? Evolution appropriates the thought "incarnation" as its mystical synonym. Evolution opens our eyes to behold incarnation in mounting stages of life, the universe through. Evolution presses the word incarnation on our lips, and shrines the awe of the fact in our hearts.

So, also, in regard to the Cross or Vicarious Atonement, the other great half of the Christo-centric theology. The New Orthodoxy, like ourselves, is more than beginning to recognise Vicarious Atonement as a law of the Universe, while claiming, of course, that Jesus' death on the cross is the supreme example and type of the law. This "law" of vicariousness is that "no one liveth, and no one dieth, unto himself"; that, first or last, the sin of one becomes the woe of many, and the virtue of one the blessing and joy of many; and, further, that by means of this fellowship of unearned peace and unearned penalty God is slowly uplifting the race, at-one-ing it with himself. Nature is the great "socialist," and this her mighty method of social salvation, her process by which the kingdom of heaven comes on the earth. Let a man, accepting this law to the full, willingly yield up his life for truth and his brothers (Jesus' "joy," you remember), and we face the most potent spiritualising force in history. Then is ideal sonship of God made real. Then is the Love at the heart of the Universe certified. Such sonship is repeatedly witnessed: to see but one Christ in history is not to see him, as to know but one Bible is not to know that. The Cross is another of the universal symbols—symbol of self-sacrifice everywhere fulfilling itself in widening salvation. Again our question presses: Where two souls, gazing on this law, are bowed in common awe before it, should differing stress on one historic illustration of the law, even if unique in pathos and historic influence—should this work divorce in religion?

We are thankful to have our thoughts thus led into paths which make for Reconciliation. We may not hope much as yet for an immediate practical outcome, and in this country the very emphatic cold shoulder of the Evangelical Free Church Council towards Unitarians may seem to point in a quite contrary direction. But there are hidden currents stronger even than the policy of the most ardent Churchmanship, and we may still rejoice in the Spirit, and feel that our own work may be immeasurably strengthened by that growing harmony of the deeper life in which we are all working together for the Kingdom of GOD and in the fellowship of CHRIST. Only let us see to it that we are living and working in that true spirit.

SIR EDWARD BURNE-JONES.

I.

THERE is a wonderful similarity, and yet a great difference in the works of the two greatest painters of our day. Sir Edward Burne-Jones and Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., are alike in their lofty conception of the true aims of art, but unlike in the choice of sphere from which they draw inspiration, and also in their method of handling their subject. The attainment of an ideal life is the end to which both artists have worked; but while Watts is distinctly modern in all that he does, Burne-Jones goes to the past for his subjects. Mythology and Romance furnish the themes for the brush of the one, whilst the other invents figures of his own to embody the abstract ideas he wishes to convey to the people amongst whom he lives. In considering the work of the man whose name stands at the head of this article, we are, therefore, asking the past for the highest lesson it has for the present. If we succeed in reading that lesson aright, we shall find it is precisely the same as that which is given by Mr. Watts, who seeks to paint the ideal conveyed by the best modern spiritual thought. We ought not to be surprised at this, for the spiritual is the eternally real, and is, therefore, the same by whatever medium and in whatever age it is found.

But the present article must be devoted to the man. His work shall be reserved for a future occasion.

The world over, Birmingham stands for business, and that not of a lofty character. Rightly or wrongly, the commercially contemptible term "Brummagem" stands for the idea that Birmingham sends forth articles which are without solidity or beauty. Art is not associated in the minds of many people with the busiest city of England's busy Midlands. Although to-day there is a splendid art gallery and a good museum in the still-growing city, seventy years ago there was nothing of the kind to arouse or develop any latent talent which might have existed in the inner recesses of a boy's being. In the days when Burne-Jones was a child there, wandering about amongst neighbours, friends, and schoolmates, Birmingham had, as prominent features, ugly buildings, black factories, with plenty of soot and much weary labour. There was little to cheer or inspire. No pieces of historic architecture to arouse the imagination of a romantic boy; no art of a kind to be any source of inspiration, however great the artistic faculty may have been there, waiting to be drawn forth. But that was the city in which one of the greatest artists of our time was born on Aug. 28, 1833. One cannot imagine that Burne-Jones would ever have been an artist had fate decreed that he should remain in that city for many years.

The family surroundings were very little better than those of the city. They were Welsh, of course, but of no particular distinction. The home life of his boyhood was that of the ordinary respectable middle-class, with the various views of life and things prevalent, which are current in the circles of strict Puritanic Protestants, devoted to business, without a sign of any kind leading us to suppose that art was regarded with any feeling higher than contempt. In the boy Edward this environment was reflected. Art was an entirely foreign province to him—unexplored, unknown, perhaps undreamt of. It was not with him as it is with so many, that there was a smothered something which was eating out the vitals of his existence because it wanted to find expression and could not. We have no immature scribbling to indicate how art burned within, desiring to find congenial atmosphere in which to flame forth. There are no signs whatever that any artistic faculty even lay dormant in young Edward Burne-Jones. It was only as he was stepping forth from youth into manhood that he was aware of any possibility of his connection with art.

When he was eleven years old he went to an ancient school, founded by King Edward in 1522, and there had for schoolfellows boys who were afterwards known as Archbishop Benson and Bishop Lightfoot. The three became friendly, for they were all intended for the Church. Schoolmasters were known to have existed in the Burne-Jones family, and Edward's father thought it would add honour to that family if one member of it could find distinction in the Church. Edward worked hard at his studies, took great interest in the classics, and became well versed in romance and mythology. His father was anxious that the boy should apply himself more definitely to studies of an ecclesiastical nature; but Edward found himself powerfully drawn to the romances of both classical and mediæval times. He was, however, desirous of qualifying for the Church, and won, in 1852, an exhibition, which enabled him to enter Exeter College, Oxford. To Oxford he went, fully determined to take Holy Orders in due course.

But at Oxford an element was to enter in the forces of his life which was destined to work a great change in it. Another young Welshman had been sent by his parents to that college, also for the purpose of qualifying for the Church. This was William Morris, the poet, artist, and craftsman who had come from Walthamstow without any special personal desire to tread the path marked out for him by his parents. The two youths soon found that they had very much in common, and their acquaintanceship quickly ripened into the closest friendship. They were alike lonely, and alike felt somewhat lukewarm at the prospect of Church life. Oxford was a beautiful city, with grand historic memories and traditions. The two students revelled together in the architectural features of the ancient buildings and their old associations, and soon discovered that there was a new world, untouched by the constant grind of every-day life. They could call up the spirits of the past and commune with them. Their fancy wove for them the whole world of romance, with its knights and ladies of ancient fables, the depths of mysterious woods and the forms of old grey castles, princes in conflict with grim dragons, and armies led to the rescue of imprisoned innocence. In this ideal world they began to live, no longer a prey to the influence of the drudgery of the common lot.

Whilst still under the charmed influence of his new surroundings, Burne-Jones came across a little engraving of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, which really became the formal introduction to his new world, and the passport to his life's work. It was only a little woodcut illustration to a small volume of poems by William Allingham, but that drawing of "Elfen Mere" was a revelation to him. It answered to the spirit within him, and he became anxious to see more of the work of the same master. When he was able to examine more important pictures of Rossetti, he was sure that somehow in the direction of the Pre-Raphaelite school he would have to find his future work. But he could not draw. Seeing Holman Hunt's "Light of the World," and another of Rossetti's paintings, his enthusiasm knew no bounds. Rossetti was, at once, to him a hero, and he felt that he would henceforth only live to try to echo somehow the work of this master and body forth his own dreams on the same lines.

Of course, all these things were talked over with William Morris, and together they came to the conclusion that they would seek careers in the realm of art, abandoning the parental ideas of the Church. But Burne-Jones had had no art training whatever. What could he do? He was determined to see Rossetti, even if he could not presume to hope for an interview. For this purpose he came up to London in the Christmas vacation of 1855, and made diligent search for his hero. He discovered that Rossetti was teaching drawing with Ruskin at the Working Men's College. To that college he therefore went, and, to his great delight, saw the object of his search. More, he was introduced to him, and spent an evening with him. Rossetti became much interested in the young man, and asked to see some of his drawings. The verdict was unwavering: "Throw up everything, and go in for art." The advice was somewhat dangerous, and the risk attached to the youth making a fresh start in life was very great. But the attempt was made—with what brilliant success the world knows.

Day by day Burne-Jones went to the studio of his new-found friend and master, and watched with interested and careful eye the movements of the painter. Rossetti was at the time painting his picture called "Fra Pace." He had been using a boy as model. Before dismissing the lad Rossetti gave Burne-Jones a palette and brushes, and asked him to paint the boy's head. The task was a difficult one, but the young man did it with enough success for Rossetti to declare that his pupil would do.

Rossetti got some small commissions for Burne-Jones, and introduced him to his own patron, Mr. Ruskin, and to other artistic friends. His studies were very successful, and his work progressed wonderfully. I do not intend to follow further the life story of our painter. It would be merely a record of pictures commenced, put aside, and finished after several years. Burne-Jones lived a quiet life, entirely taken up with his work, and content to make that as perfect as possible. But his perfection was perfection on his own lines. The Royal Academy standard was not his, and he only exhibited one picture on its walls, although he was painting for so many years. He was honoured by foreign cities, and the growing recognition of his genius in this country received a signal mark when, in 1894, Queen Victoria conferred upon him the honour of baronetcy.

He was never robust. Ill-health often interfered considerably with the progress of his work. In the early months of 1898 he had an attack of influenza, from which, however, he appeared to completely recover. On June 16 he passed a quiet day, gently working in his studio, but at night he was seized with sudden illness, and passed away in the early hours of the next day.

A future article will deal with some of the works of this great artist.

BY THE REV. J. MORLEY MILLS.

"To teach the children the doctrines of Unitarianism will be to bias their minds; they will not then be free to make their own choice in religion. To go so far as to formulate the main teachings of Unitarianism and print them and give them to the children to learn by heart will be to do a most dangerous thing. You will have given them a creed!" Such are the principal objections offered to anything like definite doctrinal teaching in our Sunday-schools. By the majority of our teachers these objections have been heeded for a long time. They have carefully refrained from teaching their children our faith, or the principles upon which it is based. If touching on such subjects at all, which they rarely do, it is often only to point out what we don't believe. And what is the result? Why, that the majority of our young people grow up into men and women without any clear knowledge of what Unitarianism really is, and, what is worse, for the most part, without the principles upon which to base any true, strong, religious life. Most Unitarians are great on secular education. As members of School Boards or other educational bodies, do they take the stand that no definite instruction must be given by the schoolmaster? Do they denounce teaching the pupils the latest theories in science, the latest modes of calculation, the latest methods in commerce, and so on? No. In the day-school, in the workshop, in the office, in the profession, the latest and the best in everything is the cry of the Unitarian, than whom none is more keen to see that only on this plan will our children have a chance in the future. But is it not perceived that true progress depends far more on the religious conceptions and ideals than on all others? Is it not seen that without the best in the higher ideals of the soul it is not possible to make the best out in the lower walks of life? That while all other teaching may supply matter with which to build, the highest motives for which to build are given only by a pure and lofty religion? As Unitarians, we think that our beliefs concerning God, Jesus, and humanity, our ideals of duty and destiny, are the noblest, the truest, and the most helpful yet conceived. Of course we all believe that

* The substance of a paper read before the Liverpool Sunday-school Society.

> The Lord hath yet more light and truth
> To break forth from his word, and hope each succeeding generation may realise higher ideals and nobler conceptions of God and duty. But the question arises, How are we to expect those higher conceptions to be realised in the future, if we neglect to teach the rising generation the best we know, and the highest we think, or believe, to-day? Is it wise, or consistent in us, to be negationalists here, while we advocate the most positive teaching in every other branch of knowledge?

Is it right to tear up all the old formulas of religious belief and definitely refuse to supply the one needed?

I contend that our children want something more than sentiment, they want truth; that they ask for something more than opinion, they want belief; that they call for more than example, they need to be put in possession of the principles on which our exemplary life is based. And if we refuse them these demands, we are cruel to the child of to-day, and unjust to the future. Whatever may be the gains accruing from the reticence, or negationalism, which is the policy of many homes and schools, I am persuaded that they will utterly fail to compensate for the losses sustained in consequence of that policy. Unitarian Sunday-school teachers need to realise three things; and, in my opinion, the sooner they realise them the better for the religious life of the future.

First: That the child-mind needs direction in religious thinking and living, quite as much as it needs direction in other branches of life and thought.

Second: That the Sunday-school exists for the purpose of giving to our young people such direction.

Third: That our young people are receiving in our public schools such direction as falls lamentably short of what we can and ought to give. While we sleep, the enemy is busy sowing tares. Now, plainly, do we consider that we are doing our duty when we turn out our young people on life's ocean without, religiously speaking, providing them with either an aim, a rudder, or a chart, thus leaving them at the mercy of every breeze that blows, and every current that rushes past them? For, soon, our young people will be out in the thick of life's conflict. In most cases a grinding competition will leave them with little leisure for thinking out their own religious faith and principles, and, often, with little desire for such a serious task. If in those times of stress and danger any of them fall away from religion, and all connection with the churches, it will be useless, it will be unkind of us to blame them for not having thought for themselves, for not having a finer faith than their fathers, while we have deliberately neglected to forearm them with the highest we thought, believed, and loved.

All this leads up to the point. But how is the work to be done? And at once we are face to face with this difficulty. In many of our Sunday-schools, young, inexperienced men and women have to be pressed into the service of the school. In many cases they have not been taught much about Unitarianism, have no strong convictions, and are, therefore, at a loss what to teach. So they fall back on the story-book too frequently, and read stories which are often strongly orthodox in flavour. Such teachers need help and guidance. When I came to Bootle, the office of Sunday-school superintendent was vacant, and I stepped into the breach. An early opportunity was taken to explain to the teachers my methods of conducting a Sunday-school. Also I told them what I had done elsewhere about doctrinal teaching, and submitted to their consideration the "Faith Card," of which the following is a copy:—

THE CHILDREN'S FAITH.

Taught in the Bootle Free Church (Unitarian) Sunday-school, Stanley-road.

1.—I am taught that God is my heavenly Father; that He created me, cares for me, and loves me as His child.

2.—I am taught that Jesus was a well-beloved son of my heavenly Father, who marked out "the Way" to Salvation and Holiness by his teaching and life, as well as his death.

3.—I am taught that God is helping me all the time to become good, by means of His influence on my soul, and by the lives and words of good men and women.

4.—I am taught that it is my supreme duty to love God with all my heart, and mind, and soul, and strength, and to love my neighbour as myself.

5.—I am taught that if I do evil it will grieve my Heavenly Father, and injure my soul, and cause pain and suffering both here and hereafter.

6.—I am taught that my faults may be corrected; and my sins will be forgiven and forgotten if I repent of them sincerely, and try to be good.

7.—I am taught that I cannot be happy or good alone, but only as I try to make others happy and good.

8.—I am taught that we make a heaven in our hearts and in our homes by our kindness and our love.

9.—I am taught that God in His Fatherly goodness will afford opportunities for all His children to become good, and some time enter His heaven, to be happy in His love for ever.

Lord help me to understand this teaching, and to live in the spirit thereof.

I was very careful to point out that no one should be committed unwillingly to the statements on the Faith Card; that their acceptance should on no account be regarded as a condition of teaching in our Sunday-school; that any teacher refusing to teach the same should not be considered to have broken any rule; that there must be perfect freedom as heretofore. I place the card before them, not as a substitute for their teaching, but as a help. With perfect unanimity, the Bootle teachers adopted it on those conditions.

So each scholar has it, on what is known as a "Star Card," i.e., a card on which the scholar's attendance is marked. A few minutes is taken up by the teacher in explaining some portion of the "Children's Faith" to the class before the ordinary lesson. About twice a month I give a ten minutes' blackboard address to the whole school on the articles in turn. Also, I write out on the blackboard two or three passages from the Bible bearing upon the articles under consideration, which the whole school will repeat. Some of the scholars will write these passages in exercise-books, that when they grow up they may have at hand a string of gems from the literature of the Old and New Testaments.

Any one who peruses the Faith Card will see that there is no attempt to teach the children to say, "I believe" the matter thereon. The key to the whole of the teaching, both written and oral, is in the short prayer in italics at the bottom—"Lord help me to understand this teaching, and to live in the spirit thereof." Our aim is to give our young people an intelligent grasp of the principles of our faith, and to imbue them with the spirit of our gospel. Never is the teaching put before the children as a creed, the believing of which is in itself a saving action. Ever is it made clear that religion is intended to be progressive in "both its thought and spirit." We are simply trying to put them where we are, so that, as we have advanced on the ground upon which we were placed as young people, they may advance.

In a quiet way I have been pursuing this method for some nine years. No teacher has yet objected to it. On the other hand, one and all have acknowledged that it has been a great help to them in speaking to their scholars on the deep subjects of the soul's relation to God, and the principles upon which to base a noble life—subjects upon which many of them durst not trust themselves to speak without its aid. Neither has a single Unitarian parent, nor the majority of parents who were not members of our church, objected to the teaching they found on their children's cards. Many have thanked me for it. As parents, they have had a strong desire to teach their children the principles of religion, but, being inapt at the work, they forbore. But my card has been just the thing they needed. It put into simple language what they themselves wished to say, but were not able to express as effectively as it does. I do not pose as a theologian. Not for a moment do I claim that my card contains just the thing that ought to be said—neither more nor less—nor that what is said, is said in the best way. The aim is simplicity. It is not altogether original. It has been drawn up from the teacher's standpoint, not the preacher's. Many teachers, I doubt not, would be able to improve upon it. But until some better method is forthcoming, I continue with mine, believing that in so doing I am, in a tentative way, meeting an increasingly felt need.

THE best moral antitote lies not in warnings, however particular, but in that positive nurture of character which is the real source of strength in the hour of temptation.—McCunn.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE annual sermons of the Association were preached in St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow, on Sunday, Nov. 24, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. The congregations were large, and the discourses were listened to with the most appreciative attention.

On Monday, the 25th, the annual business meeting was held in the church at 5 o'clock. Mr. JAMES GRAHAM presided. Dr. Barlow was unanimously elected President of the Association, and Messrs. Semple and Gemmell, the Secretary and Treasurer, were re-elected, and received thanks for their past services. The Committee's report and the financial statement for the past year were, after some conversation, adopted. Special reference was made to the transference of the Kilmarnock church property to the Association, and the reception of the congregation into formal fellowship.

In the evening a public meeting was held, over which Dr. BARLOW presided. He was accompanied to the platform by Professor Carpenter, the Revs. Charles Travers (Carlisle), John Barron (Tavistock), E. B. Drummond (Edinburgh), and Mr. James Graham (Glasgow). In the course of a most suggestive and inspiring address the Chairman said he would submit three questions for their consideration. First, was the work of the Unitarian churches in Scotland finished? He was assured that it was not. There was much liberalism in other churches, but their liberalism was inconsistent and out of place. Unitarian work, therefore, was not done. But they were charged with indifference, and this charge brought him to his second question: Is indifference to religious questions a necessary result of the acceptance of rational opinions? They could not so regard it; but why, then, did the membership of their churches not increase? Partly, perhaps, because Unitarianism was progressive. It had no stereotyped belief, and so had to battle against much prejudice. And still their Church had to be a fighting Church, but it should not be a Church of negations. Never was there greater need than now of their inspiring name and faith being widely known.

Mr. GRAHAM, in the happiest terms, moved a resolution of welcome to the delegates present, which was seconded by Mr. DRUMMOND.

In reply, addresses were given by Messrs. Carpenter, Travers, and Barron. Mr. Carpenter devoted a considerable part of his address to the advocacy of the claims of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund.

Musical items were given by Mr. Pryor and members of the church choir.

The meeting, which was most helpful and enjoyable, was, after the usual votes of thanks, closed by the Rev. E. T. RUSSELL pronouncing a benediction.

THE SCOTTISH UNITARIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.

A Conference of this Union was held on Saturday, Nov. 23, in St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow. After tea, provided in the library by the St. Vincent-street School, an adjournment was made to the church where the business meeting was held. There were about fifty present, every school affiliated to the Union being represented except Aberdeen.

In the absence of the President, the Rev. JAS. FORREST, M.A., took the chair, and, in his opening remarks, said that he was afraid some teachers did not fully appreciate the grandeur of the work in which they were engaged. There was no lack of devotion, but it was not always as intelligent as it should be. He expressed the difficulty which existed in guiding the teachers into true methods without interfering with the spirit of reasonable freedom. He then introduced the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Manchester College, Oxford, and expressed, in a word, his pleasure and the good fortune of the Union in his presence.

Professor CARPENTER then addressed the meeting. He said he was lacking in a knowledge of the conditions prevailing in Scotland, but during his recent visits to the various cities where he had been lecturing, he had come to the conclusion, as a result of his inquiries, that the systems in the Scottish Sunday-schools were widely different from those in England. He then briefly sketched the methods mainly adopted in English Sunday-schools, and pleaded strongly for preparation on the part of the teachers and for the necessity of adopting some systematic course of teaching. He expressed his belief in the advantage of learning by heart selected hymns and New Testament verses. While it was necessary to recognise the difference between adults and children, there were three guiding principles which existed and should not be lost sight of. (1) External Nature in all its aspects of beauty, up to its intellectual products in civilised man. (2) Moral Experience, and in this direction, he said, a skilful teacher could work out valuable results by carefully-prepared questions, and even by taking advantage of any little incidents in the class. He also suggested to the teachers the idea of keeping a scrap-book, containing newspaper paragraphs relating deeds of heroism at shipwrecks and railway and mining disasters, all of which could be advantageously used in this connection. (3) Great Historical Types of Religious Life. Relative to this he admitted the difficulty which the results of the Higher Criticism introduced into the work of the Sunday-school teacher; but, after all, the best things in the Bible are those which are most certain, and there was still plenty left which could be definitely relied on. He would, therefore, strongly urge that the Scriptures be not left by the teachers altogether on one side. With elder scholars, the historical growth of the Bible should be studied, and this would be sure to make it a book of living interest. If the lines which he had indicated were followed, the Sunday-school could not fail to interest the children, and educate them to become eventually intelligent members of our churches.

An interesting discussion followed, in which all those who spoke expressed to Professor Carpenter their thanks for his interesting and instructive address. It was brought out in the course of the discussion that, while the teachers should make use of external nature in addresses based on flowers or other natural objects, it was unnecessary in Scottish Sunday-schools to directly teach any branch of Natural Science, or to give any purely secular (so-called) instruction whatever. This is now efficiently done in the day-schools under the School Board system, which is compulsory in Scotland.

A very hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Carpenter for his presence and address was carried unanimously, as was also one to the St. Vincent-street School for providing the tea. With that the meeting terminated.

THE Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, of 27, Vicar's Hill, Lewisham, tells us of a well qualified Dutch lady, who speaks good English and German and a little French, anxious to obtain the care of children, especially as a governess, but hindered chiefly by the avowal of her Unitarianism. Mr. Pope would be glad to hear from anyone who might help in overcoming this difficulty.

WITH reference to Mr. Savage Cooper's letter in last week's INQUIRER as to our report in the previous week from Kentish Town, we have received a letter from the five members of the deputation regularly appointed at the congregational meeting substantiating the report we published. We must decline any further correspondence on the subject.

THE Christian Freeman for December contains a separate full-page picture of the new college buildings at Kolozsvár, with the tower of the Unitarian Church also just in sight. It is a fine substantial looking building, on the opening of which our Hungarian brethren are to be warmly congratulated. There is also a short article descriptive of the college and church. The same number includes four capital lessons for boys on "The Voyage of Life," by A. H. Biggs, "Stand By," "Slow Ahead," "Half Speed Ahead," "Full Speed Ahead," based by way of parable on the experiences of a steamship.

WE congratulate Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., on the achievement of his two elder sons. Each of them has been selected to represent his University in the football field. At the approaching University match, to be held on the 11th inst., at the Queen's Club ground at Kensington, Mr. F. W. Odgers, of Trinity College, will play for Cambridge, and Mr. W. B. Odgers, of Balliol College, will play for Oxford. They are both forwards.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Christmas Appeals.

Deptford—The Rev. A. J. Marchant writes:—I am desirous of appealing to your readers in aid of my Poor's Purse, and for our forthcoming New Year's gatherings. There is at present an exceptional amount of sickness among the aged poor, and, as some of our former helpers have passed away, anxiety is felt for the future. It is earnestly hoped, however, that other friends may come forward with assistance. As the contributions received at this season have to meet the demands of the forthcoming year, I venture to solicit a liberal response to this appeal. Gifts of money, clothing, &c. (adults' and children's), will be gratefully received and acknowledged. 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London S.E.

London: George's-row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes:—Will you allow me to appeal to kind friends for help for the Poor's Purse for Christmas gifts, parties, &c., and also for new or cast-off clothing, books, toys, &c. The address is either Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C.; or 4, Durley-road, Stamford-hill, N.

Manchester Domestic Mission, Willert-street.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop writes:—This year, I regret to say, the word urgent must be added to that of appeal, for already there is considerable poverty in our district in consequence of sickness and shortness of work and the higher prices of food and coals. To cope with this it will be necessary that the amount received for the poor's purse be largely augmented. With regard to our Christmas appeal, I am in full hope that friends will be as generous as in previous years. We have been enabled to give Christmas cheer to a number of very poor people, and also to provide an evening of real enjoyment for upwards of 300 children and 150 adults. Beyond this it has been our practice to present each scholar with a useful garment. If those in happier circumstances could realise the conditions under which our people live they would recognise what a boon all this is to them year by year. Friends will greatly help by sending money, left-off clothing, children's garments or toys, which will be gratefully received by the Rev. J. W. Bishop, Mission House, Willert-street, Collyhurst, Manchester.

Aberdare: English Unitarian Church.—The annual meeting of members of the church was held on Thursday, Nov. 28. A large company of friends and visitors assembled for tea, after which a social gathering was held, when Mr. Philip Rhys, solicitor, presided, supported by the Rev. J. Harwood, B.A., Colonel Phillips, and Mr. L. N. Williams. In addition to the address of the Chairman, a most interesting speech was made by the Rev. J. Harwood. At intervals a selection of vocal and instrumental music was well rendered by the choir.

Accrington.—At the summer meeting of the North-East Lancashire Unitarian Mission Committee, a desire was expressed that the Mission should arrange a series of special week-night lectures and services similar to those held in the Manchester district last winter; as, however, the congregations in the Mission are more widely scattered than those in the Manchester district, it was left to individual congregations to arrange for such services if desired. Accordingly, at Accrington, a series of three week-night services, with sermons on matters of religion from the Unitarian standpoint, was arranged for November. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association sent a supply of bright and fresh pamphlets; handbills were distributed by members of the church and school amongst friends and neighbours, and the services were advertised. The visible results were not startling, but were such as justified the effort. The chapel is not large, and, consequently, the congregations (which averaged sixty-five adults) were not lost in the building; there was a fair proportion of strangers, chiefly men, at each service. On Nov. 12 the Rev. Charles Hargrove gave help and encouragement by a striking address on "The True Catholic or Universal Faith"; on Nov. 20 the Rev. Charles Roper preached on "Unitarianism: A Rational Religion"; on Wednesday, Nov. 27, the Rev. Travers Herford gave a thoughtful and lucid discourse on the subject, "Back to Jesus." In each case the congregation was most attentive, and it is hoped those who were present may be helped, and the church itself strengthened by these services.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The first public meeting of the School Temperance Society for this session was held on Monday evening, Nov. 25, when a lecture was delivered by Mr. Alfred T. Davies, of Liverpool, the subject being "Licensing Administration in Liverpool." The chair was taken by Councillor J. P. Taylor, B.A. As the question of licensing administration is one of considerable activity in Bolton at present, the lecture attracted a large audience, including magistrates, town councillors, members of the School Board, and ministers of various denominations. After a few remarks from the Revs. C. J. Street, E. S. Hicks, and Messrs. T. Harwood and G. G. Armstrong, a very successful evening was brought to a close.

Boston.—The congregation of Spain-lane Chapel were encouraged and delighted by a visit on Sunday last of Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., who gave a very interesting address on "Unitarianism in Hungary." On Monday evening, in Shodfriars' Hall, Mr. Shrubsole gave his lecture on "Swiss Scenery" to a most appreciative audience. The proceeds of this lecture were devoted to the funds of the chapel. Mr. Shrubsole also gave an address on Sunday afternoon to the P.S.A. in the same hall, when a resolution was passed, containing a message of brotherly greeting to the Hungarian people.

Chester.—Last week Mr. John Harwood gave one of his popular recitals. The schoolroom was well filled by an appreciative audience, who greatly enjoyed the entertainer's clever and interesting impersonations.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The second meeting of the session was held at Walthamstow on Saturday, Nov. 30, when a paper was read by Miss A. J. Lawrence, entitled "Our Influence on the Sunday Scholar." A discussion followed, in which the Rev. W. G. Cadman and others joined. There were about thirty present.

Edinburgh.—On Wednesday evening, Nov. 27, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter gave his fourth and concluding lecture on "The Gospels in the Nineteenth Century." The Rev. Dr. Glasse, in moving a cordial vote of thanks to the lecturer, said the subject was a very important one, and expressed his surprise that a greater number had not availed themselves of the opportunity of coming for information to one so well qualified to give it. Proceeding, he said the question was not the inspiration of Scripture, but its infallibility or inerrancy. He could understand, he said, the wrench it must be to many people to give up their old ideas, having gone through the same experience himself. He had set out in life believing fully in the infallibility of the Bible, but in giving it up he considered that anything he had lost was more than compensated by what he had gained. The Church must accept the conclusions of the higher criticism. When the question of the Bible was settled, they might then proceed to the settlement of other questions. Dr. Glasse concluded by bearing testimony to the services rendered by the Unitarians, and recommending to all interested the study of Professor Carpenter's book on the Gospels. A vote of thanks was also passed to the McQuaker Trustees.

Gloucester.—The recent effort to free Barton-street Chapel from debt has been crowned with success. The Sale of Work realised £43, friends outside Gloucester contributed £27, and the remainder of the £150 required was subscribed by members of the congregation. The Rev. Walter Lloyd begs to thank those friends who kindly responded to his appeal and helped to bring about this satisfactory result.

Ipswich.—The annual meeting was held on Tuesday, Nov. 26. The annual report read by the hon. secretary, Mr. F. H. Palmer, and the financial statement of the treasurer, Mr. R. Hamblin, jun., were both of a cheering character. Under the energetic leadership of the Rev. L. Tavener, the congregation has made substantial progress in every department. There has been an encouraging increase in the number of worshippers, and many new-comers have made themselves at home. The Sunday-school, interrupted by the renovation of the chapel, has been revived and progresses splendidly. Much interest has been shown in the meetings arranged from week to week, especially in the minister's lectures on such subjects as Watts, Burne-Jones, Shakespeare, Oxford, and Florence. A social guild has been started, which is now engaged as a painting class. In spite of the loss of two of the largest subscriptions, the falling-off in income is but slight, and the balance would have been on the right side but for increased expenditure. The reports were adopted, and officers for the coming year elected. Mr. S. J. Hutley was elected hon. secretary, and the retiring secretary received a hearty vote of thanks for his services. The meeting concluded with an address by the minister, who reviewed the work and progress of the past eleven months, during which period he has occupied the pulpit, and encouraged the congregation to look forward with hope to the future, which promises to be one of great usefulness.

Kendal.—The fifth of a special series of Sunday night lectures was delivered in the Market Place Chapel, by the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, on Sunday last, Dec. 1, when the chapel was crowded, so that extra seats had to be placed in the aisles. The subject of the course in progress is "The Friendship of Nations and the Brotherhood of Man." Two lectures are being devoted to each of our neighbouring European nations, and the lectures are delivered between eight and nine o'clock, so that members of other churches may be present. On previous dates lectures of one hour's duration have been given on "The Belgian Kingdom and the Swiss Nation." Last Sunday the lecturer dealt especially with the historic city of Rouen, and particularly with that period when Joan of Arc lived. "Our Neighbours the French" is the subject of the next lecture, after which lectures are to be given on Spain and Germany.

Leeds: Hunslet.—On the 2nd inst., Mr. Thornton's family and friends gave a high-class minstrel entertainment in the schoolroom, for the benefit of the bazaar fund. Friends were present from far and near, and every inch of room was occupied, the school being completely packed. The entertainment was greatly enjoyed, lasting for more than a couple of hours.

London: Stamford-street.—On Friday, Nov. 29, by the kindly thoughtfulness of Mrs. Sabine and other friends, 130 or more poor children, selected by their teachers (several of whom came with them) from some of the Board Schools in the neighbourhood, were treated to a tea. The meal was served in the large room underneath the chapel, which was lent to Mrs. Sabine for the occasion. After tea the little ones were gladdened by presents of Christmas cards and toys in profusion, many of the latter made by willing helpers among the young people. The pleasing scene had its pathetic side—fifty of the children being mentally deficient, twenty deaf and dumb, while, prior to the tea, thirty or more were re-clothed. On leaving, the surplus food was distributed among the children. On Saturday the annual Rummage Sale was held and was largely attended. On Monday a vocal and instrumental concert of high-class music was given by Mr. John Harrison, in connection with the Social Institute, greatly to the gratification of nearly 200 persons. Those assisting were Miss Keating, Miss Alice Glover ('cello), Herr Amon Hering (violin), Mr. Porcheron and Mr. Harrison (piano). The Rev. F. Allen presided. On Monday next, as announced in our Calendar, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., is to give an evening of recitals.

London: Stepney.—The Monthly Postal Mission Religious Conference was held on Sunday afternoon last, at College Chapel, Miss Florence Hill in the chair, when Miss Tagart gave a graphic account of her recent visit, with a party numbering twenty-eight in all, to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary. Miss Tagart first gave a brief sketch of the rise of Unitarianism in Hungary, and of its apostle Francis David, under whose influence, owing to the conversion of the ruling Prince, Unitarianism became the State religion of Transylvania. She then went on to point out how subsequently the cruel persecutions of the Catholics had stamped out Unitarianism in Poland, in Bohemia, and the adjacent countries, yet it had survived and been maintained by the brave and hardy race of peasants in Transylvania. Just after the Revolutions of 1848, when political and religious oppression was at its height, there seemed danger of Unitarianism, even in Transylvania, being wiped out through lack of means to maintain their schools and college at the status required by the Government. Miss Tagart referred in touching terms to her visit to Transylvania forty-two years ago, when she accompanied her revered father, the late Rev. Edward Tagart, Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, on his mission of encouragement and consolation to convey a sum of money contributed by English Unitarians to save the College at at Kolozsvár. She contrasted that time of poverty and struggle with the flourishing conditions of the Unitarian Churches to-day, and described the large buildings crowded with devout worshippers, and the deputations from newly-formed congregations, who came out to greet the tourists, and their enthusiasm at meeting English Unitarians, and the hospitable and warm welcome at Kolozsvár of Bishop of Ferencz, and their satisfaction in showing Miss Tagart and her party the fine College buildings, for the completion of which students of all communions for the ministry were eagerly waiting. The staff of professors was hardly adequate for the candidates for the Theological Department. Throughout the tour there were repeated testimonies to their cordial feelings for England and the English people. At the close of the Conference various photographs illustrating the tour and specimens of exquisite needlework made by the ladies of Hungary were shown. Miss Emily Sharpe, Mr. Ginever, and Mr. Chambers took part in the discussion.

Merthyr Tydfil (Stone-laying).—Foundation stones of the new chapel to be built on a site in Thomas-street, adjoining the Library premises, were laid on Monday afternoon. On the previous Sunday the services in the old Twynyrodyn Chapel were conducted by the Rev. James Harwood, who was present as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. On Monday, after a luncheon, at which a number of visitors were entertained in the Assembly Rooms, and at which Mr. Harwood responded to the toast of civil and religious liberty all the world over, the stone-laying took place. After the hymn, "We come unto our fathers' God," and prayer by Mr. Harwood, the Rev. D. J. Williams spoke as to the history of the congregation and their present chapel, which dated from 1821. Two stones were then laid by Mrs. Thomas Stephens and Mr. Gwilym C. James, respectively, and after an address by the Rev. R. J.

Jones, M.A., of Aberdare, the Rev. J. Hathren Davies pronounced the benediction. In the evening a public meeting was held in the Old Chapel, Mr. G. C. James, J.P., in the chair, when among the speakers were the Rev. J. Harwood and Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. H. Wolcott Thompson, President of the South-East Wales Unitarian Association, the Revs. R. J. Jones, W. J. Phillips, J. T. Davies, Lieut.-Colonel Phillips; Messrs. G. Carslake Thompson, Gomer Thomas, and others. The new church, with school buildings, is being built of brick, with bathstone facings in late Gothic style, and is to seat 150. The total cost is estimated at £2,000, of which over £1,000 has already been raised.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The last of a series of four lectures on "The Gospels of the Nineteenth Century" was given on Friday evening, Nov. 29, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., in the Lovaine Hall. The lectures have been well attended, and principally by friends outside the churches in this district. A resolution of thanks to Mr. Carpenter was carried most enthusiastically and with acclamation.

Oxford: Church of the Divine Love.—On Sunday, Dec. 1, a memorial service for the women and children done to death in the Concentration Camps was held at 11 A.M. In the evening, at 6.30, the Rev. Vernon Herford preached on "The War, the Concentration Camps, and National Righteousness." The Litany of Penitence was then sung, all kneeling, and the choir went out singing "Lord Jesus, Come!" the magnificent hymn by Harriet Martineau, so appropriate to the present time. The church was quite full, and the congregation, undisturbed, listened with breathless attention to the tragic story.

Southend.—A course of week-evening lectures is in progress at the Darnley-road Unitarian Church. On Wednesday evening, Nov. 27, Mr. E. Capleton explained Zola's Social Ideal, as depicted in his recently-published book "Work." There was a good discussion afterwards, and much interest was evinced in the subject.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE INQUIRER will be published next week at the usual time, and will be our Christmas number; but in the following week, as Christmas Day falls on Wednesday, it will be necessary practically to make up the paper on Tuesday evening. We beg, therefore, that all editorial matter and advertisements for the issue of Dec. 28 may be sent in so as to reach the office not later than Tuesday morning, Dec. 24, and the earlier the better. Only the most urgent matter, and that in the smallest compass, will have a chance of insertion in that week's issue, if it arrives later than noon on Tuesday.

WITH intense relief we heard from Mr. Brodrick's speech at Glasgow on Wednesday evening that the Government are at last moving in the matter of the Concentration Camps. What the death-rate was in October we have not yet heard, and November is also past; but now we learn that the west camps are to be broken up, and the numbers to be reduced in all. The overflow from the Orange River Colony is to be sent to Cape Colony, and from the Transvaal into Natal, and it is hoped that more permanent shelters will be provided near the coast.

PREACHING at Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, last Sunday morning, the Rev. C. J. Street told the story of an Irish medical hero, and by a simple narrative of the facts relating to his death made a powerful appeal for the widow and children who survive. Having described the wild coast of Donegal and the extreme poverty of the people, Mr. Street said that his story could not be better told than in the touching words of the Dublin Correspondent of the Times, which were as follows :—

"Dr. William Smyth was the medical officer of the Burtonport (Donegal) Dispensary District, which includes the island of Aranmore. An epidemic of typhus fever broke out in this remote and miserable spot, and found a fatal stimulus in the poverty and ignorance of the islanders and the insanitary condition of their hovels. The neighbouring people refused their help, and Dr. Smyth fought the fever absolutely single-handed. Every day he rowed his boat across the stormy waters of the Sound to the island, a distance of four miles, and worked for hours in the cottages, devoid of windows, and therefore, owing to lack of sunlight and ventilation, reeking with foul air. In many cases he had to carry a lighted candle to enable him even to see his patients, who lay sometimes three and four in one bed.

"When at last he persuaded them that their only chance of recovery lay in removal to the mainland, he was confronted with the difficulty that, owing to the terror of the contagion, no one would help him, or even lend him a boat. Fortunately the arrival on the scene of Dr. Brendan MacCarthy, the Medical Inspector to the Local Government Board, brought him at least one willing helper.

"Without any other help these two doctors brought the typhus patients down to the beach, embarked with them in a crazy boat, and rowed them across the Sound. So defective was the boat that she was only kept afloat by the continuous baling of the strongest of the patients, and she sank five minutes after reaching her destination.

"All the patients were safely transferred, and are now on their way to recovery, but Dr. Smyth has himself died of the typhus from which he saved so many. He left a wife and eight children, the youngest of whom is six weeks old. They are without means of support and an appeal on their behalf has been issued by the President of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, and all heads of the medical profession in Ireland."

Mr. Street has received several donations from members of his own congregation, and if any of our readers should also wish to help, he will be glad to take charge of their gifts. His address is Maythorn, Heaton, Bolton.

THE Rev. W. C. GANNETT'S sermon, from which we quoted in our leader of last week, is separately published by his congregation, but will be found also in the Christian Register of Nov. 21. That same number contains the monthly supplement of the A.U.A. on "Unitarian Word and Work," which is devoted to the interests of the work on the Pacific coast. There are a number of illustrations of church buildings, and among them that of Oakland, where the Rev. B. Fay Mills is now minister. We looked with special interest for Mr. Hosmer's church at Berkeley, but it does not appear. The church buildings at San Francisco and Los Angeles, if we may judge from the pictures, are substantial, and not without dignity.

THE performance of Dan'l Druce at St. George's Hall on Thursday week, generously arranged by Mr. J. H. Leigh, M.A., for the benefit of the London Domestic Mission, was a great success. Although the hall, which holds 700 people, was not full, there was a very good audience, and the amount taken for tickets was £55, the whole of which Mr. Leigh gives to the Mission. The evening's entertainment opened with Lumley's clever one-act comedietta Palmistry, rendered with great spirit by Mr. Murray Lochner and Mrs. J. H. Leigh, and then followed the three acts of W. S. Gilbert's Dan'l Druce. The piece is, perhaps, too closely packed with sentiment, but it was a thoroughly enjoyable performance, and Mrs. Leigh's Dorothy was delightful, and in the most tragic moments very moving. The humour of Mr. Herbert Lawford's rascally Reuben Haines was a great relief. All the friends who took part, on the stage or otherwise, in securing the success of the evening, are to be warmly congratulated on the result, and the gratitude of the Mission is above all due to Mr. Leigh for his great kindness in the matter.

WE are glad to see that the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's International Council paper on "Religious Thought in England at the Close of the Nineteenth Century," which is, of course, included in the volume of "Proceedings of the Council," has also been issued separately as a penny pamphlet for wider distribution, and may be had from the B. and F.U.A. at Essex Hall.

THERE would seem to be still some valiant champions of Eternal Punishment left, at any rate, in Scotland, for the Rev. Alexander Webster has been engaged in a two evenings' debate with Mr. James Anderson, of Fauldhouse, an Evangelist, who stood up without flinching for the literalism of the old popular belief in all its hideousness.

THE December sermon in the Mill Hill Pulpit is on "The Twentieth-Century

New Testament," that most interesting version in modern English, which is now completed (and will be found advertised in our present issue). Mr. Hargrove gives instances of the great freshness of this translation, and it would seem to be most admirably done. But when we are told that the archaisms of Elizabethan English stand in the way of a full understanding of the original, we are not at all sure that the colloquialisms of modern English, which occasionally find their way even into sermons, would not be worse. And when it is said that the translation must be in present-day English, we naturally ask, Whose English? Might not a certain stateliness of diction come nearer the truth in giving us the narrative of the life and teaching of Jesus than the familiar talk of our every day?

SHORT NOTICES.

In good time for Christmas, we are glad to welcome Miss F. E. Cooke's Story of St. Francis of Assisi, which there is no need for us to commend to the readers of our "Children's Column," and of her many delightful biographies for young people, and the "England" in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Children's Study Series." This new little book is in the same form as Miss Cooke's most recent biographies of Whittier and Dorothea Dix, and has for frontispiece a picture of the statue of Francis at Assisi. "Perhaps now, more than ever," Miss Cooke says in a brief Introductory note, "we need the kindling influence of great aims and lofty ideals, and it would surely be well for ourselves and for the world about us if we were to try to carry the spirit of St. Francis into our daily lives." (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 1s. net, postage 2d.).

Let all who wish to be wisely and happily guided in their selection of Christmas presents for their young people send at once for the Catalogue of Books published by the Sunday School Association, and also for their larger classified catalogue of Books for Young People, the seventh annual issue of a most useful publication. With these two catalogues we have been glad also to receive a copy of the paper on The Teacher's Aim: To raise the Scholar's Ideal, read by Miss Marian Pritchard at the recent Autumn Session at Leeds. (Sunday School Association, 4 and 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.)

All loyal Unitarians who value that indispensable companion of a rightly ordered life can now procure a copy of The Essex Hall Pocket Almanac for 1902. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

The Rosebud Annual is much the same as last year, with plenty of amusing animal pictures, and children and fairies and a few of Louis Wain's cats (but most of them seem to have gone into his own Annual this year—Treherne and Co., 1s.). The Rosebud nonsense verses are not very brilliant, but the book would keep lively little children quiet for a good long time. (James Clarke and Co. 4s.)

Among the booklets of selections, beautiful and helpful, that give pleasure at this season to send and to receive are many of established reputation and some new ones. The Essex Hall book-room clerk will send a list of available works of the kind. We may add a mention of Mr. Albert Broadbent's publications, of which three dainty little specimens have reached us. They consist of A Festus Treasury, A Treasury of Consolation, and A Mackenzie Bell Treasury. We have already referred to Rose's Diary, by the late Henry Septimus Sutton, which is uniform in style and price—neat paper cover, 3d. Our preference amongst the three now to hand is shown in the order of naming. We observe that a Treasury of Lyrical Poems, by Mr. P. J. Bailey—the venerable poet whose "Festus" is not so well known to the younger generation as it deserves—is announced for this month. The Festus Treasury gives a goodly number of quotations, and includes much that is striking, and nothing that is not good. Mr. Broadbent (Oxford-street, Manchester) is to be congratulated as a philanthropist, if not as builder of a fortune, on his inspiration to issue this class of work at a price which obviously leaves no margin of profit.

The Religion of Civilisation and The Religion of a Gentleman; both by Charles F. Dole. He who takes up these two little volumes, each of rather more than 200 pages, printed in conveniently large type and well "leaded," and observes the scope and importance of the subjects which the author has essayed to deal with in such brief compass, will not accuse him of lack of courage. It is, indeed, the last sin that can be laid to his charge. The brevity of the treatises, however, is evidently well considered by him. There is pressure enough within the works to expand them to double their present size, if only the author were not so firm a believer in the value of the ancient advice, "let thy words be few." Readers suffer so much by the opposite tendency that we have not much heart to deprecate this ultra-brief dispatch. Mr. Dole began life as a doubter; he has reached faith that is fully described by calling it absolute optimism. Exuberant of thought while niggard of speech, he rushes at one difficulty of thought after another, grips it hard and strangles it, leaving it for dead on the field. Whether it is to be slain so swiftly, the mature mind may be allowed to ponder, not without misgiving. That is the worst we have to say about these two rather notable little volumes. Addressed to young minds especially, and obviously keeping in view the American ideal of "snap" (we have no cis-Atlantic equivalent), his thorough-going buoyancy and dash cannot fail to challenge the reader's attention, and stimulate his thought. The former work is issued by Allenson, price 5s.; the latter by Crowell, New York, price one dollar.

The Fatal Opulence of Bishops is a volume by the Rev. Hubert Handley, M.A., Vicar of St. Thomas's, Camden Town. It may be acknowledged that the suspicion which the title raises is partly justified on reading the work. There is a touch of sledge-hammer in the style; but the writer is most assuredly no blind fanatic, and his book ought to do good, not only in the direction of the particular reform which he advocates, but in recalling everyone who has a care for religious culture, and especially ministers, to the appalling indifference of the mass of the people. Mr. Handley draws up a list of seven reasons alleged for the impotence of existing ecclesiastical agencies—namely, (1) the written sermon; (2) stereotyped forms of prayer; (3) lack of easy congregational singing; (4) scandals of mismanagement and the sale of livings, &c.; (5) pew-rents; (6) obsequiousness to the rich, rudeness to the poor; and, lastly, the vast income of the bishops. He acknowledges the fact that with the name of wealth the bishops often labour in financial difficulties, but this he charges upon the system of artificial dignities and useless appanages which only one here and there, like Bishop Fraser, has the courage to forego. A particularly glaring case is cited. Notwithstanding the deliberate assertion of a high authority that the good work of the Church in Birmingham would increase 50 per cent. if a Bishopric were established there, the recent scheme to establish one was abandoned because not more than £2,000 a year could be guaranteed for the episcopal revenue. Surely something is very "rotten in the state of Denmark" when this has to be chronicled. We hope the author's appeal will not be in vain; the spiritual condition of our people is such that we could forgive a much less decorous mode of address for the sake of the moral vigour and the high mind here manifested. (A. & C. Black. 5s.).

The first volume of Max Müller's collected works was issued early in 1898, and contained the Gifford Lectures on "Natural Religion," delivered at Glasgow ten years before. We have now received the eighteenth and concluding volume, Last Essays, containing a second series of "Essays on the Science of Religion." These include the three articles on "The Religions of China" which appeared last year in the Nineteenth Century, the last of them only after the author's death. In the concluding essay on "Is Man Immortal?" we find the following sentences:—

> Only let us remember that if our love is the love of what is merely phenomenal, the love of the body, the kindness of the heart, the vigour and wisdom of the intellect, our love is the love of changing and perishable things, and our soul may have to grope in vain among the shadows of the dead. But if our love, under all its earthly aspects, was the love of the true soul of what is immortal and divine in every man and woman, that love cannot die, but will find once more what seems beautiful, true, and lovable in worlds to come as in worlds that have passed.

In this volume are also the essays on "Indian Fables and Esoteric Buddhism," "The Alleged Sojourn of Christ in India," "Mohammedanism and Christianity," and "The Parliament of Religions at Chicago," &c. (Longmans. 5s.)

NEW ZEALAND: AUCKLAND.—A letter has come to hand this week from the Rev. W. Jellie, B.A., stating that the dedication and opening ceremony of the new church would be held on Dec. 4. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie has received further contributions of £10 from Mrs. George Holt, and £10 from Miss Holt in aid of the Building Fund, making a total of £320 1s.

No longer talk at all about the kind of man that a good man ought to be, but be such.—Marcus Aurelius.

LITERATURE.

DR. HASTINGS' DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.*

THE third volume of this new Dictionary of the Bible, a monument of great labour and distinguished scholarship, was published last year, and it is only with a shame-faced apology that we can bring up our notice of it now. For reasons which we need not further specify, but connected with inexorable fate, the completion of this notice has been again and again delayed, and if we are to look for any fragment of very human consolation, it must be in the fact that the fourth and concluding volume of the Dictionary, which was to have been published this year, is also for unavoidable reasons delayed.

This third volume does not fall short of the high excellence of the other two, and leaves the same impression as we recorded in speaking of the second, as a demonstration in force, with all the arms that scholarship can furnish, in defence of a complete scheme of orthodox Christianity. It was natural, perhaps, that we did not turn with quite the same eagerness to this further volume, as in the case of the second, which dealt with the supreme subjects of God, the Holy Spirit, Jesus Christ, and Incarnation, and also with John and the Fourth Gospel, and the Gospels as a whole. These were decisive as to the character and stand-point of the work; and yet, in the new volume, though we knew more fully beforehand what to expect, there is a great wealth of interest, and, as we have said, no falling off in the quality of the work. The two central points of interest we have found in the articles on Miracle and St. Paul, but there are also separate articles on the three first evangelists and their Gospels, on Peter and the Epistles which bear his name, the first of which is affirmed to be authentic and the second denied. Among other subjects most fully dealt with are the Old and New Testament Canons, the Language of both Testaments, and Law as interpreted in each. Of Old Testament subjects Moses, Leviticus, Numbers, Micah and the Maccabees fall to this volume, and of more general subjects, Money and Music, while Lieut.-Colonel Conder writes on Palestine, as in the second volume on Jerusalem. Professor Adeney's article on Mediator and Mediation is also one of the chief contributions, touching a subject of vital interest. Professor J. B. Mayor's article on Mary (the Virgin) is a good example of the way in which the Dictionary deals with crucial questions. The critical difficulties connected with the birth-stories in Matthew and Luke, the genealogies and the silence of the whole subsequent Gospel narratives as to a Virgin birth, are fairly stated, but every difficulty is over-ridden by the strength of the orthodox tradition, and the story is accepted in every detail as veritable fact, of surpassing divine significance, with no suspicion that it contains elements of unworthy conception, or any consideration of the questions raised by other stories of Virgin birth in the ancient world.

One of the best of the shorter articles is that on "Knowledge," by Professor Denny, of the Free Church College, Glasgow. It deals not with knowledge in general, but with religious knowledge, the knowledge of God, as it is to be found variously presented in the Bible, and in less than four columns will be found a most helpful guide for the study of that great subject. From the elaborate article on "The Language of the New Testament," by Professor Thayer, of Harvard, we will allow ourselves one quotation:—

> A person familiar with Attic Greek, who should take in hand for the first time a Greek New Testament would not fail to be struck by its peculiar idioms. Apart from traits which distinguish one portion of the volume from another, the language in general would seem strange to him—by reason of the admixture of popular, not to say plebeian, terms in its vocabulary; by its occasional outlandish and hardly intelligible phrases and constructions . . . and throughout by a style which, while it shows occasionally the digressions and broken or anacoluthic sentences characteristic of colloquial and uneducated utterance, is seldom encumbered with parentheses or protracted and entangled periods; a style obviously the expression of men too simple, too self-forgetful and earnest to pay much heed to literary elegances or the established rules of the rhetorician.

The article on Paul, the Apostle, occupies thirty-four pages, and is by Professor Findlay, of Headingley College, Leeds. It is not such a masterpiece as Professor Sanday's article on Jesus Christ; but it is elaborate in its treatment, both of the life of the apostle and of his doctrine. Its apologetics we find by no means convincing, and particularly in the treatment of Paul's conversion. This, we are told, was the result of "no mere spiritual call, such as every servant of Christ hears—but 'a word from His mouth,' for Paul had seen Jesus "in the visible human form." And in a further passage we read:—

> The conversion of Saul is a psychological and ethical problem, the solution of which is to be found only in the actual appearance of Jesus Christ to his senses on the way to Damascus, as he believed this to have taken place. Nothing but his certainty of that appearance could have convinced him that Jesus was raised from the dead, and was therefore the Messiah and the Son of God.

Professor Findlay does not feel any difficulty in harmonising the narrative in Acts with Paul's own teaching, but this acceptance of the supposed miraculous appearance which satisfies the senses and is no "mere spiritual call," seems to us a total reversal of the actual order of experience, for which there is no warrant in what the Apostle himself says on the subject.

The article on "Miracle" is by the Rev. J. H. Bernard, D.D., of Dublin, and occupies sixteen of the closely-printed pages. It is the work of a keen logician, but vitiated, as it appears to us, by its initial assumptions and by a total neglect of all considerations derived from the occurrence of parallel "miracles" in other religions of the ancient world. Dr. Bernard, who also has a useful article on "Nature," argues that to no one but a thorough-going Materialist can miracle in the abstract be impossible, and to that we should imagine that most thoughtful people in the present day would readily assent; but the real question is of fact and history. Do miracles happen? Have they happened in the past? Or, in the light of our present knowledge of history and the method of evolution in the religious life of man, must we not rather say that what have been held to be miracles are to be otherwise interpretated, and in a sense far more satisfying and congruous with our deepest faith in the spiritual realities of our life with God. Dr. Bernard himself admits that the argument from miracles must not be pressed into the service as proof of the existence of God, since it is only because we believe in God as the Supreme Cause, who can intervene in the settled order of Nature, that the thought of miracle becomes credible; and his position is that because the Fall introduced a breach in the divine order some exceptional intervention is necessary to put it right, because sin is the true ἀνομία, the true violation of law, the remedy must be found in a corresponding miracle of grace. Thus the supreme miracle is the Incarnation, since the person of Christ is essentially supernatural, his natural humanity being "associated with the unearthly, spiritual powers of the Godhead." This being assumed, any other particular "miracle" may follow as a matter of course, and any question of more or less credible is beside the mark. As a matter of fact, in this presentment of the subject, the miracles have to be proved by the Divine power and goodness of their author (for Dr. Bernard admits that a mere marvel might be of Satanic origin, for the deception of the innocent), and indeed one sees how this is the case in the relative treatment of various kinds of miracles. Thus the blasting of the fig-tree is accepted without compunction, because one of the acts of him who was so essentially good, and there must have been some good purpose and meaning in it, and the Old Treatment miracles are covered partly by the same principle of special Divine purpose, but partly also (e.g. Jonah's experience, and the three children in the fiery furnace) explained as legendary. When we come to ecclesiastical miracles of later centuries, much more scepticism, but not too incautious, comes in, and the distinction is drawn between a "miracle" as the sign of a new spiritual message to mankind, and mere wonders, which can claim no such significance. Dr. Bernard asserts that the whole body of Gospel miracles and that of the "resurrection" in particular, cannot be eliminated without destroying the reality of Christ's life and divine message to the world. For our own part we are not so sceptical, and do not despair of a spiritual interpretation of that great history. Christ's witness to life and love stronger than death is established on a far surer foundation than any argument from miracle. We have not yet fathomed the depths of personality, nor do we claim any finality for our interpretation of the sacred records; but we are convinced that the growth of spiritual insight is leading us not back to the conceptions of marvel, which belong to the childhood of the world, but forward to a more perfect knowledge, in present communion with the Eternal. And with this conviction we are led to a new understanding of the Gospel story, and what issues from it in the uprising of the Christian Church. Amid all the clash of argument, the ebb and flow of opinion, we see once more the purely human Christ, in grace and truth transcendent—the hope of the world because human as all his brethren are human, and because with him, before all others, we learn to know and to do the Father's will.

OLIVER CROMWELL.*

OLIVER CROMWELL we have always with us. Even "the indolent reviewer" can never come too late to overtake the endless literature that is now flowing around his memory. The "flowing tide" is indeed with him, and bronze and marble and granite come now after two and a half centuries with subtle irony to mock such arts of perpetuity. This piece of adamant, flanked by his Ironsides—how should men ever forget him, either to perpetually admire or perpetually to hate. The average reviewer cannot plead guilty to indolence, but ought rather to apologise as we do for the impatience that rushes in to notice books that have scarcely yet existed the probationary year. Mr. Paterson's book is the work of a hero worshipper, and he would fain fit his hero to the dimensions of a stage. But somehow a giant never moves easily in a drama. Mr. Firth's book is circumstantial and convincing, at once picturesque and documentary. He is, in the happy phrase of Mr. Morley, one of "the heroes of research." Mr. John Morley's book is judicial, and Cromwell is to be congratulated on his judge. Not all in vain do men appeal to posterity for vindication. Whatever bias there may have been in this judge seems to be effectually neutralised by a touch of philosophy, of which this dictum at the threshold may be taken as a typical instance. "It may be," says Mr. Morley, "that 'a man's noblest mistake is to be before his time.' Yet historic sense forbids us to judge results by motive, or real consequences by the ideals and intentions of the actor who produced them. The first act of the revolutionary play cannot be understood until the curtain has fallen on the fifth. To ignore the Restoration is to misjudge the Rebellion."

Well, truly, the reaction came, "but what worlds away!" And, oh, the difference to us! We are accustomed to call many things the chief safeguard of our Liberties. In the last analysis, we are convinced, the true safeguard of English liberties—well, British, if you like—is Oliver Cromwell. He foreshadowed, if, indeed, he did not actually fashion, that magical attribute of modern Royalty, Constitutionalism. He extinguished the halo of divinity on the brow of despotism, and brought flaunting extravagance within controllable limits. The devolution of responsibility has shifted the incidence of punishment from King and Ministers to the People, and Nemesis stands indeed ready at the door, but no longer in the horrid guise of "the two-handed engine." Not Kings and Ministers now, but Nations and Peoples are branded, as a whole, with Infamy. Neither Laud, nor Strafford, nor King Charles could now win the dubious glory of living in history more by men's pity than their scorn. Yet when the many-headed King, in an irresponsible mood, loses his heads, or a majority of them, he is most apt to assert "divine right," and the brutal sarcasm of Prince Metternich, describing the uproar of a howling mob as the vox Dei, is not entirely unpardonable. Mr. Morley's judicial and philosophic treatise seems like a sustained homily on the words of Joubert :—

> Forms of government become established of themselves. They shape themselves; they are not created. We may give them strength and consistency, but we cannot call them into being. Let us rest assured that the form of government can never be a matter of choice; it is almost always a matter of necessity.

This is doubtless good evolutionary doctrine, and seems to glance at the prematurity of revolutionary methods. Yet since Revolutions "happen" they must be no exceptions to Evolution, but that same thing in one of its Protean disguises. The godless Restoration had not far to go to meet half-way a god-forsaken Rebellion that had begun as a righteous Revolt against a revolting Despotism. From the modern point of view Cromwell seemed to stand out clearly as the "Man of Destiny," but as one traverses this troubled chapter of our History in company with the impartial Historian one is amazed to find how much Cromwell seemed to be merely "waiting" for the main events "to shape themselves," how much he seemed to be dancing attendance upon his Fate, stepping tardily into each of the positions that ultimately raised him to virtual kingship. If it is true that many weak shoulders have craved heavy burdens, it appears undeniably true in the case of Cromwell, at least, that Atlantean shoulders, far from craving, reluctantly and painfully hesitated to assume the burden. If cruel Necessity relieved Charles somewhat rudely of his burden, it was little less cruel in the way it imposed it on the stronger shoulders. And one is apt to reflect in reading Mr. Morley's masterly summing up that if as he makes abundantly clear "the punishment of bad princes" (the words are Joubert's) "is to be thought worse than they really are," the reward of good princes (and as Princes go, surely Cromwell was the best of them) is to be credited with doing far less than they actually did. A fine light is thrown upon Cromwell's problem and his subsequent tangled solutions by this noble passage :—

> Cromwell never showed a more sagacious insight into the hard necessities of the situation, than when he endeavoured to form an alliance between the King and the army. All the failures and disasters that harassed him from this until the day of his death arose from the breakdown of the negotiations now undertaken. The restoration of Charles I. by Cromwell would have been a very different thing from the restoration of Charles II. by Monk. In the midsummer of 1647 Cromwell declared that he desired no alteration of the civil government and no meddling with the Presbyterian settlement, and no opening of a way for "licentious liberty under pretence of obtaining ease for tender consciences." Unhappily for any prosperous issue, Cromwell and his men were met by a constancy as fervid as their own. Charles followed slippery and crooked paths; but he was as sure as Cromwell that he had God on his side, that he was serving divine purposes and upholding things divinely instituted. He was as unyielding as Cromwell in fidelity to what he accounted the standards of personal duty and national well-being.

As no Divinity was ever yet found on "slippery and crooked paths" we may leave Charles to his fate. Cromwell had striven with the King for "Liberty of Conscience, and Liberty of the Subject—two as glorious things to be contended for," said he, "as any that God hath given us." He had won. Now came the thorny path for his statesmanship. What his principle was we are left in no manner of doubt. It has been marvellously well embodied in these words of Joubert, "Statesmanship is the art of understanding and leading the masses, or the majority. Its glory is to lead them, not where they want to go, but where they ought to go." But alas! the path of this glory has repeatedly, if not uniformly, led the true statesman to some kind of Calvary. And there is no fault anywhere except in our poor human nature in the lump, which prefers fleshpots to manna, and plains to mountains, the dreary passivity of slavery to the vigilant activity (in wildernesses) of explorers for a promised land, which, in short, prefers the line of least resistance. And Cromwell came at a time when he could only trust that human nature which he himself had welded into iron-like consistency. And it was not a large constituency. His throne was scarcely broad-based upon the people's will. Oliver Cromwell became by sheer consistency of ideal statesmanship the Prime Minister in a Theocracy. He believed in Freedom if only men were, as his immortal Latin Secretary expressed it, "wise and good." He believed in Representative Government if only the country consisted of such free constituents as so defined, or a majority of them. It remained for a later century and another piece of adamant, flanked by his Ironsides, to establish the doctrine and give it trial that the only way to render men wise and good and so truly free was to put great trusts and responsibilities upon them. It is a hard fate for men to have to live in a transition period, awaiting the days when men shall be wise and good, and therefore truly free. The transition period has some woeful signs of being a "chronic complaint" of States, and one could almost welcome a Cromwell, wise and good, and free to act benignly rather than a gusty Democracy, that at one time reaps a whirlwind, and at another drifts on many currents in an ominous calm. But the Democracy is young, and impulsive—caught more quickly by sentiment than by reason and truth. These, however, are strong and will prevail. By discussion alone can truth be sifted from error. On these principles the serious modern Statesman bases all his hopes. Cromwell, we are told, "had little comprehension of that Government by discussion which is now counted the secret of Liberty." Perhaps the interminable nature of seventeenth-century oratory may have had something to do with Cromwell's characteristic exercise of the "closure." Yet that he had no great faith in force as a true remedy for social ills seems fairly obvious. His toleration had but one limit created by his dread lest some form of error (it was generally assumed to be Roman Catholicism) should lie like Truth and, making the worse appear the better reason, deal a fatal blow at universal liberty, from under the protecting cloak of Truth. It was no doubt a lack of faith in the ultimate victory of Truth, a lack of faith in the ultimate power of discussion to achieve that victory. "In things of the mind," said Cromwell, "we look for no compulsion but that of light and reason." Ay, if only all parties would abide by this truly glorious principle and by no indirection of covert or overt compulsion nullify it, all would be well. Unfortunately that which "pleases men," and not that which may be shown to be "for their good," exerts the most dominant influence in a State. Doing things for our good may justify the actions of a benevolent despot, even as necessity is claimed as justifying the actions of a malevolent despot. In the last resort it is to be feared there is no justification for any domination that admits or implies even a minimum of intolerance. We can never persuade another that a certain thing is for his good if, to begin with, he does not even wish to discuss the matter. "'Tis the general good of the kingdom that we ought to consult," said Cromwell. "That's the question, what's for their good, not what pleases them." And in the same speech he added: "Things obtained by force, though never so good in themselves, would be both less to their honour, and less likely to last." "Really, really, have what you will have; that you have by force, I look upon as nothing." "I could wish," he said earlier, "that we might remember this always, that what we gain in a free way, it is better than twice as much in a forced, and will be more truly ours and our posterity's." "It is one of the harshest ironies of history," says Mr. Morley, "that the name of this famous man, who started on the severest stage of his journey with this broad and far-reaching principle, should have become the favourite symbol of the shallow faith that force is the only remedy."

Yes, and in the bald enumeration of the inevitable successive steps that Cromwell felt obliged to take to disentangle the situation things do indeed take on a woful aspect—facilis descensus Averno: "purges, proscriptions, camp courts, executions, major-generals, dictatorship, restoration," this was the path, the descent. Yet in this unpromising soil the germs of Constitutionalism and genuine toleration and freedom were sown, and have in one great reign at least made vast upward growth and borne no mean first-fruits. Though the nation may periodically make its bed in Hell, the spirit of Cromwell will seek it even there to lure it or to constrain it to resume the burden and the glory of its truly freest, most virile and god-fearing days. Speaking nationally, he still remains the chiefest safeguard of our liberties.

DOGMATISM AND SCEPTICISM.*

PROFESSOR BÜCHNER'S volume, says the translator, has been introduced to English readers as a companion to Haeckel's "Riddles of the Universe" (reviewed in THE INQUIRER, March 9, 1901). Both books show how incompetent a great investigator may be when he leaves his own particular problems and essays to solve the enigmas of creation. The present volume is a collection of short papers written by Dr. Büchner between 1891 and 1899. It is prefaced with a pleasantly-written life of the author, by his brother. The author's credo may be summarised in the following dogmas:—Only two things exist—matter and "force." Force is never found apart from matter, and only shows itself in the motion of matter. We do not know what matter is, and we cannot explain many of its properties. Its most inexplicable property is to produce sensation, thought, and feeling in the brain. Nevertheless we are certain that these are produced by matter and by nothing else. Dr. Büchner insists that his system is not properly called "materialism," because he holds that not matter alone but "matter and force" produces all things. It is hard to see the difference; for, according to his own words, "matter and force" means no more than "matter in motion," and all matter is matter in motion. "Evolution" is the name of Dr. Büchner's God. Christianity is wholly pernicious—a degenerate form of Buddhism, from which its first teachers borrowed most of their ideas.

It is curious that the Rationalist Press Association—under whose auspices this book is published, and who presumably desire to be nothing if not "advanced"—should make a point of publishing obsolete German theories characteristic of the middle decades of the last century. Such a theory as that of Büchner, while it has the merit of disposing of Religion, is almost equally inconsistent with modern Physics.

In several of these essays the author asserts a theory of knowledge equivalent to that of Hume: that all our knowledge is manufactured out of "sensations—i.e., facts given to us by our five senses. Now nothing is more certain than that the logical results of this position were worked out by Hume; and what is Hume's conclusion? We can find causes for our beliefs—beliefs, for instance, in our own existence and the world around us—but never reasons; belief is a gentle force, inclining us to groundless conclusions. Hence the true philosopher yields gracefully to the impressions and maxims which he finds, as a matter of fact, to have most sway over himself. "I may," says Hume, "nay, I must, yield to the current of Nature in submitting to my senses and understanding, and in this blind submission I show most perfectly my sceptical principles"; for, after all, "if we believe that fire warms and water refreshes, it is only because it costs us too much pains to think otherwise." Thus did Hume set the problem of modern philosophy, by dissolving all beliefs, scientific and other, in a universal scepticism, and proving that such was the outcome of the very principle which the materialism of the nineteenth century has paraded as affording the only true foundation for scientific knowledge! If the materialist's account of the origin of knowledge is true, it destroys the foundation on which his own system rests—the existence of the eternal, all-productive "matter and force."

Mr. Hodder's book is a very able attempt to find in the position of Hume a permanent resting-place. Not that the book enters on a discussion of Hume's views; but the result is the same as that of Hume. There is no rational foundation for any belief or knowledge that goes beyond the impressions of the present; but Nature compels us to go beyond them, hence we must try to arrange and codify the ways in which this compulsion operates. The greater part of the book is taken up with keen destructive criticism of most of the affirmative ethical and philosophical thinking of the day—especially that of Mr. F. H. Bradley and Professor Royce, of Harvard. In this respect the book may be of service; for in philosophy the advocatus diaboli plays a very useful part. More value than this cannot be granted to Mr. Hodder's work. The only impregnable scepticism is that which doubts its own conclusions, and thus prepares the way for new construction.

HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS.*

THE Sunday-school Association, in publishing "Twelve Hymns and their Writers," has produced a book which is as well suited for home reading as for the Sunday-school. It was announced some time ago that a volume was to be published of lessons for children, on hymns in the Association's Hymn-book. It has turned out to be a work of higher and more permanent value than a mere set of lessons for children. The twelve short biographies and criticisms (we use the word in its best sense) form an introduction to literary biography and poetry of a special class, which older readers may study with advantage. For very young children it is best, perhaps, to take a hymn as it stands in thehymn-book, learn its lesson, and sing it, as an act of devotion, without inquiring whence and how it came to us. Mr. Hamilton Thom, it may be remembered, edited his hymn-book for congregational use without names of the writers or any information about the hymns. It was intended for devotional use, and no personal or critical associations had any place in it. But as we grow out of childhood we cannot ignore the spirit of the age in which we live. Ours is a critical age, an age in which literature of every class is studied, and not merely read and enjoyed.

What is wanted is not to discourage the desire to know who wrote the hymn we love to sing, and whether it has been altered, and if so by whom; but to encourage reverent and sympathetic study. To know how a hymn has reached its present form in our hymn-books does not necessarily lessen one's love of it, or make it a less perfect vehicle of our devotional utterance, any more than knowledge of the flowers need diminish our love of them. In the volume before us, for example, the well-known hymn, "How lovely are Thy dwellings, Lord," is traced from the verse in the Psalms, "How amiable are Thy Tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts," through the rude but regular stanza of Sternhold and Hopkins, and Milton's version, to Martineau's adaptation of Milton, in which appears the added thought of the union of the congregation in their worship. When we know all this the hymn means more, not less, than it did before.

But the volume is not confined to literary criticism. There is, in each case, an exposition of the lessons and spiritual meaning of the hymn selected, with illustrations from other hymns and poems, sometimes by the same writer, and sometimes by others. And, most important of all, there is a short and telling Life of each writer selected. Bishop Ken the sturdy and conscientious churchman, Isaac Watts the equally conscientious dissenter, Charles Wesley the religious reformer, Oberlin the practical reformer, who required every candidate for confirmation to plant at least two fruit-trees by way of contributing to the future welfare of their village—all these are here; and the gentle Cowper, and that vigorous Scotchman, Norman Macleod, and the saintly missionary, who left the sunny skies and flowers of Devon to give his life for his poor neglected brethren in Liverpool, and others. This is a book for Sunday afternoon, for old or young, and in it may be found fit company and song for the sacred day of rest and life.

THE STORY OF THE TARGUMS.*

THIS is the address with which Mr. Manning inaugurated the present session of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. It gives many excellent and curious examples of the Targumic methods of translation and exegesis, and so serves to throw light on the ideas current in those Jewish schools in Palestine and Babylonia in which the Targums were elaborated. In this address, however, Mr. Manning is dealing with the Targums chiefly as helps to the textual critic of the Old Testament. His general conclusion that in this respect they occupy a subordinate but useful place may be accepted. But Mr. Manning does not appear to realise that the Targums are almost entirely collusive witnesses to the traditional Jewish text. It is accordingly futile to adduce the support of the Targums for the traditional text, as he does in the three cases where he disposes of readings put forward by Siegfried, Cornill, and Wellhausen respectively, unless it could be demonstrated that in these particular cases the Targums provide an independent testimony. In other respects also Mr. Manning gives the Targums an antiquity and an authority which we think they cannot be shown really to deserve. He repeats more than once that they represent traditional interpretations of the Old Testament from the time of Ezra. At the utmost this statement could be true only of the Targums on the Pentateuch; but, in fact, it rests on theories of the close of the Canon and the transition from Hebrew to Aramaic which are no longer maintained in scientific works on the Old Testament. That Mr. Manning really holds these theories appears as well from his representation of the returning exiles under Zerubbabel and Ezra as bringing back with them from Babylonia a knowledge of Aramaic, and from his citation of Malachi to show that Hebrew was still understood in B.C. 432. Deutsch, who is Mr. Manning's chief authority, does not state that Ezra originated the custom of giving translations of the Scriptures into Aramaic, but only that the Talmud traces it to him; in any case the view is not tenable in view of the fact that writings which were certainly not intended only for the learned class continued to be produced for at least two centuries after the time of Ezra, in a language which is still Hebrew.

In the course of a short lecture Mr. Manning could, perhaps, be hardly expected to indicate the evidence on which he relies as against the modern critical position in these matters; but to the address in its printed form a few explanatory notes might have been added. With regard to some other points we think Mr. Manning is unduly positive. In view of the complexity of the subject and the twofold nature of the tradition, it is too much to say that there was no such person as Onqelos. Dr. Schiller-Szinessy, for example, holds that there was such a person, and that he lived a century earlier than Aqilas. And unless it could be shown that some particular process of miracle so guarded the transmission of the Old Testament that no error was allowed to occur without leaving a trace in the documentary records, it is surely arbitrary to say that no subjective improvement of the Old Testament text can be admitted unless supported by the early documents.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS, MAGAZINES AND CHRISTMAS NUMBERS.

CANON HENSON'S article in the Contemporary Review we have referred to in our leader this week. The number opens with an elaborate article by M. Jean de Bloch on "Militarism in Politics and Lord Roberts' Army Reorganisation Scheme." Mr. F. S. A. Lowndes writes on "Journalism for University Men," and the Rev. W. W. Peyton contributes an article on "Anthropology Reconstructed." Mr. Peyton is always a thoughtful and interesting writer, and whether we are able to follow him in his conclusions or not, we are heartily at one with the closing words of this article, in which he says that it behoves the student of the science of religion to take with him the prayer and purpose of Milton:—

> Thou, Celestial Light
> Shine inward, and the mind through all her parts
> Irradiate, there plant eyes, all mist from thence > Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
> Of things invisible to mortal sight.

The Monthly Review completes its fifth quarterly volume not, perhaps, quite fulfilling the promise of its advent last year; but lovers of the occult should turn to Mr. Andrew Lang's article on "Magic Mirrors and Crystal Gazing," while those who are considering the grave question of National education in this country may do well to look at Mr. Cloudesley Brereton's "Birds-eye View of Education in America." There are two illustrated articles this month, a brief paper by Mr. R. E. Fry on the "Symbolism of Signorelli's 'School of Pan,'" a curious old picture in the Berlin Gallery, and an account by Mr. Baillie-Grohman of "A Famous Mediæval Hunting Book."

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Snead Cox, of the Tablet, replies to Mr. Wilfranc Hubbard on the subject of the Association Laws in France, and seems to hold that the Religious Orders are being driven from that country because of the hatred of the secular party for their schools, which he declares are proving their superiority to the public schools which have hitherto held the field. Mr. Snead Cox, coming of a family for generations closely allied with the Jesuits, speaks in high praise of that Order. Mr. W. S. Lilly writes on "Marriage and Modern Civilisation," also in the interest of the Roman Catholic Church, in which he finds the only safeguard for the strict maintenance of an institution essential to the soundness of modern civilisation. One of the most interesting articles is Mrs. Henry Birchenough's second series of "Sketches in a Northern Town.

Cornhill opens with an article on "Thackeray in the United States," by General James Grant Wilson, with some of the great satirist's amusing sketches. In this year's Christmas number there is a great variety of illustrations and a good deal of work in colours, some very curious, and some really beautiful, as in one or two pages of the Queen. Mark Twain and Bret Harte are both represented in Harper, which has also some new letters of R. L. Stevenson's and an appreciation of Rosa Bonheur. In Scribner there are some beautiful pictures of "Where the snow falls in the Adirondacks," and a charming little sketch, "The Last of the Fairy Wands"; also an article on "The Old Virginian Sunday."

The English Illustrated opens with a study of Giovanni Segantini, a young Italian artist, by Luigi Villari, with illustrations from his pictures, and the article on "Queens of the Court of Valois" has some quaint and picturesque old world pictures. The Sunday Strand also has an interesting article in the series of "Great Religious Painters of the World," on J. M. Strudwick.

RELIGION enters into the very lives of numbers of us—men, women, and children; it makes us what we are; it moulds our characters; it urges us on to action, and it holds us back; it is with us morning, noon, and night, none the less really because we are not always thinking about it. Therefore it does matter, and matter much, of what kind our religion be, if indeed it be earnest and sincere, for such as it is, such shall we be ourselves; moreover, truth is surely for its own sake to be valued, but we shall never come to know what is true by indifference, but only by serious regard for truth and genuine fear of error.—Charles Hargrove.

OBITUARY.

MR. RICHARD WEBB.

THE congregation worshipping at New Bridge-street, Manchester, has suffered another loss by the death of one of its most attached and faithful supporters, Mr. Richard Webb, which took place after a brief illness on Wednesday, Dec. 4, at his residence, Moss-lane East, in his eightieth year.

His father, who came of a west country family, practised as a solicitor in this city; his mother was a member of the highly-respected family of Baker, of Ilminster. Richard was the eldest of several sons and daughters, two of whom still survive.

For the greater part of his early life he held positions of trust in the service of mercantile firms, and then was appointed to the office of cashier-in-chief to the Owens College, an occupation which proved most congenial to him, and which he filled for many years. Here his genial manner, extreme accuracy, and unwearied assiduity secured, in an eminent degree, the confidence and regard of the governors and of all with whom he held official relations. He took little part in any public matters, but gave regular and close attention to his duties at the college and the affairs at his church.

After many years of faithful services he resigned his appointment, and was the recipient of a substantial recognition of the approval and esteem with which the authorities regarded his labours—an esteem which has endured to the close of his life.

He had been a member of the Strangeways congregation since his youth, and was, perhaps, the last of those who had known the old Green-gate Chapel. By the regularity of his attendances at the services and in other ways he manifested his strong attachment to the religious principles which he held with undoubting faith.

He married a sister of the late Alderman Grundy, a name still well known to Manchester Unitarians, and leaves his widow and a son and daughter to mourn their loss.

The interment took place at Blackley Chapel on Saturday last, when the service was conducted by the Rev. W. R. Shanks. Besides members of the family and relations there were present Alderman H. Rawson, J.P., Mr. W. H. Talbot, Mr. George Cook, and others.

On Sunday morning at the conclusion of the sermon, the Rev. W. R. Shanks alluded to Mr. Webb's death after a long and happy life of steady and unostentatious services, to his character, kindly manner, the respect in which he was held by all, his cheerful spirit, and the marked and exemplary steadfastness with which he observed that religious faith in which his mind found satisfaction to the last.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"HE is like a man beholding his natural face in a glass." This is a verse I read the other morning, and I stopped when I read it, thinking of all the people who had got up that very morning and looked at their faces in the glass. I dare say the boys and girls who read this column all looked in the glass before they went downstairs this morning, and, perhaps, many other times during the day. There are so many things one needs to look in the glass for—to see if the hair is tidy, or the tie and collar straight. And though, for boys at least, it is rather troublesome to get into the habit of looking after little things like these, still it is a good habit to form, because it is part of the general good habit of being orderly and neat in our appearance; which, again, is one of the habits which make us more agreeable to those we live with, and make the world a pleasanter place to live in.

Then the verse went on to say, that this man went away and forgot all about his looks.

And, really, that was the best thing for him to do. Having shown him what was amiss, so that he could put it right, or having shown him that all was right, the glass had done for him all it could. It certainly would have been a mistake for him to go away with his mind full of his looks, so that he was fidgetting about them, or shy and awkward because he did not like them, or vain and affected because he liked them too much. After one has turned away from the glass, one ought to forget it, and not be remembering either how pretty or how plain one is, nor how becoming or how unbecoming the dress or the hat is.

But there are other looking-glasses than the one on the dressing-table. There is the glass of our own mind.

We call our thoughts, you know, Reflections. We call what we see, when we look into the glass on the dressing-table, a Reflection. You see it is the same word, and it is pretty much the same thing. For what we see in the looking-glass is not our face itself—nobody ever saw his own face—but a resemblance, an image of it. And what we see in the glass of our mind is also the resemblance, the image of ourself or our act—not the very self or act. It is a reflection. It is the self or act pictured in our thoughts, so that we can judge it, and see if it be right, beautiful, what we wish it to be. And this glass needs more attention than the other.

How often it happens that, thinking over what we have done or said during the day, something strikes unpleasantly. We think, "I was cross, I spoke unkindly. I have a quick temper, I must try to govern it." Or, "I was ill-natured and made an offence out of that which was not meant for one. I ought to try to take things more pleasantly." Or, "I was selfish in not letting brother or sister have my toy or my game." Or, "I was shabby in trying to hide what I did, and letting some one else be blamed for it." Or, "I forgot what I was told to do, or what I promised to do. I must try to be more careful."

There is the reflection of our conduct in the glass of our mind. It stands and looks at us, and says as plainly as by words, "Put me right." And we mean to put it right. We mean to think next time.

Then we think of something else. We turn away from the glass, and forget how we looked to ourself. And the next time we feel cross, or impatient, or lazy, or selfish, we act in just the old way. We have forgotten all the glass showed us, forgotten what kind of boy or girl we were.

There is another glass we may look in—the glass of other people's minds. I dare say you have amused yourselves sometimes by looking into someone else's eyes to see the little image of yourself in them. There is such an image of us in others' minds—the reflection of what we are, and of what we do. Our good humour, our kindness, our self-forgetfulness, our wish to please or to help, our industry, our obedience, they are all reflected back to us from the minds of those we live with. And, alas! so is our ill-humour, our self-will, our laziness, or whatever there is which makes a bad impression on them.

Now we are all given to resenting this bad impression, this disagreeable reflection of ourself. We are apt to say it is not a bit like us. It must be the fault of the glass.

Well, perhaps, it sometimes is, for other people are not perfect any more than we are. But, believe me, the best way is to look steadily at this reflection of ourself as it comes back to us from others, and ask ourselves if there is not something in us that makes them think of us as they do. Not to turn away from it because we do not like to think we look like that, but to take the hint from it, and see if there is not really something to alter in ourselves.

How pleasant it is, when one looks into the looking-glass, to see a bright, happy, kindly face looking out at us! I think it is nice to look pleasant to oneself. But, oh, how very nice it is to look pleasant to others—to have the image reflected back from them a cheery, kindly, beautiful one, an image that nobody forgets, or wants to forget!

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

SIR,—We are unwilling to close our report with a debt on the above fund. I would ask you, therefore, to kindly allow me to make one more appeal through your columns to our always generous contributors. We have spent some £15 more than has been received in subscriptions; but the fact that 100 more children have had a fortnight in the country causes us not to regret the expense incurred, but rather to rely once again upon the kind support which has always been given to this movement.

I shall gratefully receive any small additional subscriptions.

LONDON, DECEMBER 14, 1901.

FIFTEEN HUNDRED MORE.

Two more weeks remain in which to fulfil the hope of the promoters of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund, that the first capital sum of £20,000 should be raised by the end of the year, so that the way might be clear for the Special Committee of the National Conference definitely to launch their scheme, and to begin the good work, which is for the benefit of ministers and congregations alike, at the opening of 1903.

At a meeting held in London on May 28 of this year, the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, President of the National Conference, and Chairman of the Superannuation Committee, in the chair, the first public appeal was made on behalf of the Fund, and met at once with a most generous response. On July 2, at a meeting in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, it was announced that half of the needed £20,000 had been promised, and a beginning had been made with annual subscriptions, of which the Committee asked for £300. On Oct. 1 another influential meeting was held in Birmingham, when it was announced that in addition to the last two thousands promised by Mr. FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD and Mr. WILLIAM COLFOX, the donations amounted to over £12,000, and the annual subscriptions to over £200. As we write these lines we see from a note kindly furnished by the Treasurer that now the donations amount to not less than £16,200, and the separate list of ministers' contributions to £279, so that with the two final donations the Fund stands at £18,479, and we are probably right in saying that when these lines are read there will only be the last £1,500 to be raised, while the annual subscriptions now stand at £260.

Writing on this subject on July 6, we said :—"The time is ripe for such an appeal, for the proving of our faith, and the demonstration of the power of that common life in our churches, so happily manifested in the spirit of the recent gatherings in Whit-week. When we remember what has been given in the past and what has already been given for this cause, it is impossible to doubt that the hopes of the promoters of the Fund will be fully realised."

The figures above quoted show what good ground there was for the conviction thus expressed. But there is the last £1,500, the hardest of all to get! The result so far has been achieved by most generous giving, in the smaller donations no less than in the greatest, and by the most devoted and strenuous work. Mr. CARPENTER, the Chairman of the Committee, has done the work of twenty men, and has been loyally helped by other members of the Committee and friends in the various localities where meetings have been held. In the North and the South, in Ireland, in Scotland, in the West, and in the Midlands, everywhere Mr. CARPENTER has been, speaking, urging the claims of the Fund, and the campaign is not over yet. Once he has been in Liverpool, but is to be there again, and in other Lancashire towns. Liverpool we know, and the great gift of CHRISTOPHER RAWDON in the old days. Of the donations already promised some of the most generous come from that home of many great and beneficent givers, but the Liverpool list is not yet complete, and we look with eager hope for the last result. Where else our great-hearted Advocate is to go in this next fortnight we do not know, but let it be understood that this final effort must not be left to one man, though through the post he have his hands in a hundred places at once, and no one else has quite such eager persuasiveness as he.

The claims of the Fund have now been clearly put before our whole people; they know what it will mean for the strengthening of our ministry, and therefore of the common life of our churches. They know the need, and to what final effort the generous hearts of our leaders are pledged. It is for them to say, whether it shall be in vain. Many ministers, who will themselves receive no personal benefit from the Fund, have made their own donations, according to their means, and have earnestly advocated the cause with their people. Not a few congregations have made joint contributions. Are there still ministers who have done nothing? Are there congregations from which not even the humblest gift has been made? Then in these next ten days let the appeal be made, out of the heart of each congregation itself, that the smallest sums may be gathered up, with a goodwill in which there is no littleness; and let those who have great means of giving once more earnestly consider what this work means in the brotherhood of our churches. Fifteen Hundred More! Let there be none standing aloof, except of those who have already given all they can; but of the rest let there not be one with no share in this last

CHRISTMAS GIFT!

INCLUSION.

THERE is a notable article in the current number of the Contemporary Review by Canon HENSLEY HENSON on "Our Unhappy Divisions: a Plea for the Recognition of Non-Episcopal Churches." The desire for greater unity in Church life, the Canon says, has in these days laid a strong hold on the Christian conscience. "The practical urgency of combining religious men in the crusade against the disintegrating and demoralising forces of modern civilisation is becoming apparent to the most conservative of denominationalists. In front of a task, the magnitude and difficulty of which are daily increasing, the best Christians in all the Churches regard with an impatience which grows quickly into disgust the miserable waste of spiritual energy, and the lamentable loss of spiritual prestige caused by divisions which seem equally unnecessary, irrational and perverse." But in the way of any nearer union stands that theory of the National Church, now in the ascendant, which regards all Nonconformists as schismatics, and non-episcopal orders as no orders, and thus makes intercommunion impossible. This Anglican theory, the recent fruit of the Oxford movement, Canon HENSON laments as a retrograde step to the intolerance of the reign of Queen ANNE, and a mischievous denial of that liberty which in happier periods of its history prevailed in the Church. It is strongly urged that the time has now come when the English Churchman ought once more to give frank recognition to non-episcopal ministers. The logic of facts has long since destroyed the "divine right of Kings," and it must also make an end to any claim to divine right in the Episcopacy.

Here are facts, the logic of which Canon HENSON rightly presses home :—

> The great English denominations have spread throughout the world, and, unless some unimaginable forces reverse the prevailing tendencies, they are destined in the future to take a paramount position in the reformed Churches. English Churchmen are slow to appreciate the magnitude and rapidity of their progress. Even within this island their growth has greatly exceeded that of the Church of England, and though little more than a century ago the "dissenting interest" seemed evidently waning, it is probable that at this moment half the professing Christians in the country are Nonconformists. When, however, we look beyond the confines of Great Britain, and consider the religious state of the British Empire and the United States, the importance of non-episcopal Christianity becomes immediately apparent. The National Church, then, does not now stand over against a few novel and heavily suspected sectaries, but has to define its attitude towards a federation, or quasi-federation of organised and militant Churches, some of which represent a religious energy and a volume of Christian conviction far greater than its own. Numbers, it may be said, are properly irrelevant to truth—the title deeds of a religious society cannot be its success. But the "Free Churches" are not only numerous and increasing societies: they are mighty evangelistic agencies: they add their full contribution to theological science: they enrich the spiritual life of Christendom with their full proportion of beneficent and saintly lives. Will any candid observer maintain the moral inferiority of non-episcopal Churches?

That is a courageous utterance for a Canon of Westminster, and reminds one of the spirit of a former Dean. From our own point of view we may not think that the plea goes very far, and yet it must be gladly welcomed as making for "the intercommunion of all Reformed Churches" which would terminate "the humiliating isolation of the Church of England."

A plea with a much wider scope is that contained in the first volume of a new series of handbooks on current ecclesiastical problems, under the general title "The Church's Outlook for the Twentieth Century." This first volume, by Dr. W. F. COBB, Rector of St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate, is, according to the title, on "Theology Old and New" (Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d. net), but it touches upon a much wider range of subjects, affecting religion, the Bible, and the Church, from a bold and liberal Churchman's point of view.

Where Dr. COBB stands will, perhaps, best be seen from the following concluding passage of his book:—

> The age on which we are now entered promises to be pre-eminently the age of the Spirit. The very strength of materialism is one of the proofs of this. For humanity has always been at the point of an outpouring of the Spirit when at its lowest degradation. Man cannot live by bread alone, and when he has tried the experiment to the utmost the reaction sets in. The remarkable movement towards Christian Reunion in Scotland, the confederation for certain purposes of the Free Churches in England, the joint meeting of the Congregational and Baptist Unions, all show a strong movement towards union on the basis of the possession of a common spiritual life. The very fact that psychology is becoming more and more recognised as a leading feature in our science of religion seems another indication of a return towards trust in the Spirit, and the subordination to the Spirit of the letter of the creed, canon or organisation. We are beginning to understand more profoundly than ever how true it is that "no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost." Worship in spirit and in truth, acceptance of Jesus as the highest Revelation of God, and love of the brotherhood of mankind—these promise to be the chief forces in determining at once the religion and the theology of this twentieth century."

In his hope for the future Dr. COBB stands strongly on Canon HENSON'S side in his conviction that the high Anglican doctrine of the Church must be abandoned. He goes back to the ideal of the Kingdom as taught by JESUS, who instituted no ecclesiastical order, and shows how groundless are the exclusive claims of "the Church."

Which view of the Church, therefore, we may well ask, is this century likely to adopt—that which dangles before our eyes a theological entity hung up between heaven and earth, or that which points us to a holy society of men and women pledged to further the coming of a kingdom whose characteristic is righteousness and joy and peace in the Holy Ghost? The one is a speculation, the other a practical reality. We cannot doubt for a moment that the "Catholic" view is doomed, and that the "Protestant" view is the one which alone suits the testimony of the New Testament, is worthy of the sublime purpose of Jesus Christ, and maintains the character of His teaching as a Gospel and not a Philosophy, and has the additional advantage that it can enlist in its support the best thought and aspiration of the age we live in.

This is a book to be read by all who are interested in the movements of liberal religious life. "In the battle of life," Dr. COBB says, "and above all in the battle of spiritual life, not to go on is to stand still, and to stand still is stagnation, and stagnation leads to death." "It is not a revolution which is desired, but the recognition of an evolution." If only this spirit could prevail in the Church and in the great Nonconformist bodies of the land—the true spirit of the Reformation—a great advance would be made towards that ideal of the Kingdom, which so many, amid all their differences of doctrine and of ecclesiastical order, hold as a common faith and hope.

What the issue of these movements of thought and aspiration may be we do not forecast, but are thankful for every stirring of new life, which, like the fresh morning breeze, seem to herald the coming of a better day. For our own Free Churches, even in this time of reunion, we do not look for inclusion in any great ecclesiastical body, but our hope and prayer is for inclusion in the Church of the Spirit, in which amid diversity of doctrine and outward order all alike are pledged to the highest service, seeking not their own but the FATHER'S will, set on helping the world's need and doing a common work for the Kingdom of GOD on earth.

Children of men! not that your age excel
In pride of life the ages of your sires,
But that ye think clear, feel deep, bear fruit well,
The Friend of man desires.

THE test of the true faith should be its power to charm and command the soul—so commanding that we find honour and pleasure in obeying.—R. W. Emerson.

SOCIAL WORSHIP.

BY THE REV. W. M. BRUNDAGE, PH.D.*

I FOR one do not believe that we can easily over-estimate the importance of social worship in our churches that shall be broad and sympathetic in spirit and true to the thought of our time. We may be perfectly ready to admit that no priest or minister is necessary to constitute true worship; that no church is necessary; that one may worship God under the open sky, in the fields, or in the forest or beside the sea, just as truly as in the customary house of prayer. We may frankly admit that wherever there are found men and women who are serving a noble unpopular cause with disinterested devotion, wherever men and women in true self-forgetfulness are seeking to uplift the fallen, to comfort the broken-hearted, and encourage the weak and hopeless, there is found genuine worship that cannot be misunderstood.

The practical question is not whether the rare and gifted individual can get along without the social worship of the church, but whether the average man can get along without it, whether he will be as apt to "do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with his God" without its uplift and inspiration as with it, and whether even the rare and gifted will not be the better with it than without it. Because we are social beings, we need the help that comes from genuine social worship to fit us for the noblest activities of life. I do not believe that there is anything that can take its place, any substitute for it that can produce just the same results. For those who, while they differ from one another in belief, share a common spirit and are working toward a common end, to come together and together commune with their God means infinitely more in the re-enforcement of the individual's flagging courage, in the quickening of his faith, in the deepening of his devotion, in the comforting of his sorrow, in the enrichment of his spiritual life, than solitary worship amid the most beautiful and sublime scenery the world affords.

The great Companion is never far from any one of us, but we are not always and everywhere equally conscious of His presence.

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little we see in Nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!

The church at worship ought to (and does, at its best) help men to get back their "hearts," help them to catch the vision, hear the voice. It lifts to a higher plane of thought and feeling, into a purer, diviner atmosphere, in which they can see more clearly and truly, in which their material interests lose their exaggerated importance and sink into insignificance in comparison with the great spiritual interests of life. In the conscious presence of their God they pledge themselves anew to the unfinished tasks awaiting them. Their ideals become distinctly defined, and regain the reality which they had lost. They once more perceive that only in the service of those ideals can they be at one with their God.

Unassisted by their fellows, only those rare and gifted spirits among us are able to catch the vision and hear the voice. The ordinary man finds the stern struggle for bread too absorbing: he lives at too high a pressure, is distracted by too many cares. His eyes are glued upon the ground. Left to himself, he finds it almost impossible to lift them up to the mountains, whence alone cometh his help. Certainly, the church at worship has a divine mission to him.

If there are any among us who feel that they do not need the inspiration of social worship, the consciousness that others need them ought to be a sufficiently powerful motive to induce them to unite with their fellows. After all, it is what we can give, more than what we can get, that ought to constrain us. Thus, coming together in the spirit of a true worshipper, in the spirit of a sympathetic brother man, forgetting for the moment all that divides, ignoring all merely individual idiosyncrasies, we can best help one another to the possession of "that quenchless faith" without which life would not be worth the living.

"I believe in the communion of saints." Surely, there is no nobler article than this in the Apostles' Creed. When men once come to believe in it, they will be irresistibly drawn to the public service of worship and will help to lift it to its best.

We know that Emerson, after many years of absence from the village church at Concord, went back to it again because of what he found it meant to his spiritual life. Gifted prophet though he was, he needed the help that came to him in the social worship as much as his fellow-worshippers needed him.

Only recently a layman of our fellowship, one of the most devout and thoughtful of our writers, confessed to me that, after a long absence, he too, had gone back to his place in the church because he had missed its services. He had thought that he could get along better without the church than with it, but he had discovered his mistake. He had determined hereafter to exert all his personal influence to help to make the church at worship more efficient.

One word more in conclusion. To produce the best spiritual results, I do not believe that we need an elaborate ritual of worship. To many of us, the simpler the service, the better. We prefer that more be left to our imagination. We worship best when we are free from the distractions of conventional forms.

I for one dislike to hear those of our own fellowship criticise "our bare, uninteresting congregational service." It is bare and uninteresting only when the singing is merely perfunctory, when the Scripture readings are carelessly selected and slovenly interpreted, when the prayers are laboured and artificial. It is bare and uninteresting only when a warm human sympathy and a devotional spirit are wanting. And who but ourselves are to blame for this spiritual barrenness?

Certainly there can be no objection to the introduction of an elaborate musical and responsive service for those who like it, provided the spirit of true social worship be not sacrificed. But to many of us the only enrichment of the service of worship that really counts is the introduction into our simple congregational forms of a more profoundly devout spirit, of a more intelligent and adequate appreciation of the presence of our God, and of an enlargement of our social sympathies. We cannot be persuaded that any merely æsthetic elaboration of the service is calculated to help us to feel more deeply the ties that bind us to one another and to the great family of God or to help us to realise more thoroughly the supreme worth of our ideals and the demands they make upon us.

After all, the final test of the value of our worship will be the fidelity of our service.

Oh, he whom Jesus loved hath truly spoken!
The holier worship which he deigns to bless
Restores the lost, and binds the spirit broken,
And feeds the widow and the fatherless.

Then, brother man, fold to thy heart thy brother.
Where pity dwells, the peace of God is there.
To worship rightly is to love each other,
Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer.

SIR EDWARD BURNE-JONES.

II.

IN this and a third concluding article, I am anxious to deal with the works of Sir Edward Burne-Jones, but it is not my purpose to set before my readers a complete list of the artist's pictures, or to arrange them in a chronological order. It would not be difficult or dull to take each picture in the order in which it came from the studio, and describe it as minutely as possible; but I propose rather to make a selection of the most impressive, and ask, as we stand before each picture, the questions—What has the artist seen? and What would he show us?

There was very little of the materialist about Burne-Jones. When you stand in the midst of a number of his paintings, you feel that you are surrounded by representations of another world. "The maker of those pictures has seen visions," you say. He has not stayed to depict everything interesting he has seen about him. His figures and faces are not of the people you meet with every day. Consequently, gazing upon his beautiful creations, you forget all those manifestations of temporal life which are stained by ugliness and deformity. You may approach pictures as some do, expecting to find a simple window giving you a view of some commonplace object, and consider that the more you are deceived by the mimicry of some part of the work the greater the art. But if you approach Burne-Jones in that way, you will be sadly disappointed. He is no window maker; neither is he an imitator of photography. His pictures speak to us of that world where the spiritual predominates over the material, where love and faith succeed in penetrating the commonest surroundings, and reveal the beauty that lies hidden beneath. It is not that he passes by every-day life, but that he looks so intently upon it that the superficial becomes of little account, whilst the deeper meaning of that life is, to him, the all-important.

He found that he could illustrate these deeper meanings with more effect by old legends and myths of classical and mediæval times than by reproductions, however faithful and pathetic, of ordinary modern scenes, or even from the Hebrew Scriptures. Burne-Jones would rather paint the Garden of Hesperides and the Apple of Discord than Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. He frequently uses the beautiful and tender stories of the Bible, but by no means limits himself to such subjects for spiritual teaching. The legends of Troy, the thoughts and stories from Homer, the visions of Dante, the robust imagination of Chaucer, the delicate fancy of Spenser, Shakespeare and the Arthurian legends are very largely drawn from in the making of his pictures. Anywhere, in fact, that he discovers some illustration of the quest of the holiest, he is ready to go and get inspiration for the attempted realisation of the ideal. Anything he finds which will help to this end he seizes, and puts it beautifully on canvas.

We will take a few examples. On several occasions he has treated the allegory of Pan and Psyche, but very beautifully in two small canvases. The one is "Pan and Psyche," and the other "Psyche and Cupid." Psyche is, of course, the Soul; Pan is Nature, and Cupid, Love. In the first picture we are introduced to the realm of which Pan is king. It is barren and rocky and a stream flows in the foreground. Out of this stream a very beautiful and tender figure arises. It is Psyche, the Soul. She has wandered from the realm of spirits, and enters the territory of Pan. She seems very much out of place—so delicate and lovely, and the place so rough. Pan sees her, and himself half-animal, half-man, pities her. He is, like his country, strange and rude; but he is also simple and reverent. He bends down from one of his rocks and kindly offers her all the help he can. She seems so much alone and, being filled with surprise at all the strange experience of the moment, accepts the proffered help of Pan. As you look at the picture, you feel they are strange companions. The Soul so frail and spiritual, Nature so rough, strong, and animal. But they are very good companions for a time, though not for ever. Nature can only be fit for the Soul in its earliest days. Pan is but a suitable companion for the childhood of Psyche; and Psyche grows. Who is she to find for a friend in her maturer years?

Burne-Jones answers the question in another picture. The Soul is surprised and delighted when it first takes in the wonder of Nature, and for a time man's soul and simple nature are companions; but as the Soul develops it needs a higher than Nature for companion, and it can only find true solace and companionship in Love. So the artist has painted poor Psyche, who has wandered about in search of a higher companion and found her way into a garden of lovely flowers, but there sunk down, tired and weary and sighing, has gone to sleep. Whilst she is dreaming Cupid has come down from a higher realm, and already stands by her side. She will wake soon, and in her new visitor will find a companion who will really satisfy.

One of the most powerful of the artist's pictures is called "The Merciful Knight."*

It is an illustration of an old Florentine legend to the following effect:—A knight rode out one Good Friday in search of his brother's murderer, determined to avenge the crime. He found the murderer unarmed and at his mercy, but touched by the thought of the day, held his hand. He sheathed his sword, forgave the murderer, and himself prayed for mercy, remembering Christ. The legend says that as the knight that evening worshipped at a wayside shrine; the figure of Christ bent from the cross and kissed his cheek in recognition of his mercifulness, and it is added that the knight then and there laid down his armour and vowed that he would devote the rest of his life to religion. He it was who founded the monastery of Vallambrosa.

Of this legend Burne-Jones grasped the central thought so clearly with all its precious meaning, and expressed it so marvellously in his picture that it is one of the most powerful of modern works of art. It is moonlight, and a pale silver glow rests on the whole of the scene. The background is a hilly landscape, and in the foreground the wayside shrine is painted in all the minute detail that only Burne-Jones was capable of. The figure of the kneeling knight is a wonderful piece of work. The pale weary face is turned, pleading and trustful, to the figure on the cross. The recent soul-struggles have told markedly on the features, over which there seems to rest an unearthly beauty. The divine presence, in a most mysterious way, is suggested by the picture. The figure of the Christ-image is as beautiful as the armour-clad knight; its bending grace is admirably painted. The idea at the back of the legend, it seems to me, must be clearly realised by anyone looking thoughtfully at the picture, "Blessed are the Merciful!"

Let us now take the world-celebrated picture called "The Golden Stair." It is a beautiful dream of exquisite womanhood. Apart from all mysticism, this picture is a vision of loveliness of face, grace of form, and harmony in design and colour. Its completeness of scheme and beauty of detail make us all admire this picture. It is a procession of beautiful girls descending from the top of a house to the basement—singing, talking, and playing musical instruments. There is an opening in the roof, from the edge of which white doves are looking down upon the lovely maidens as they descend along the golden staircase to the lower parts of the house. Though there is that serious sadness somehow felt, there is also the breath of spring and joy. The basement is dark, and there work is carried on. Little of sunshine can penetrate there. Through the opening in the roof the blue sky, the sunshine, and the pure air may be realised, and the song of birds heard. The maidens bring the influence of these good things to where they are not usually felt. They have come from purer realms to brighten lives not so well favoured. As they descend they will come in contact with other spheres of life—spheres which will be new to them—and the happy girls realise a seriousness and a wonder which they have not experienced before. Every one of the many figures on the well-covered canvas may be truly described as beautiful; and the thought which the picture is intended to materialise is beautiful also. It is the descent of the noblest qualities upon the people of earth. Each beautiful girl represents a quality which is a gift from a higher plane—dignity, sobriety, curiosity, pity, love. These all come bringing music with them; but without jewels or other dress ornaments; sufficiently adorned by their own loveliness of character to cheer earth's fitful and struggling life with their presence and song. From the beautiful blue of heaven's light all the figures catch a soft and tender radiance. They bring from the spiritual sphere the light of eternal purity and love, and so brighten the work-rooms and kitchens and dark basement of the house of earthly life. Worry and scrambling are the dominant features of the humbler walks of life; but the artist would urge that even these spheres may be beautified by light-beams from spiritual qualities of other and higher spheres. We live in the cellars of life, and often shut out the light of God's sun and sky. Burne-Jones seems to say in this lovely painting: "Open your doors and windows and let in heaven's light." There are multitudes of lovely, spiritual and angelic beings waiting to enter the dark rooms of your house of life. God has sent them; they wait at your door with music and song. Let them in, that your life may be sunshine and joy. Your calling is a high, not a low one. You should not live in the basement always, but in the topmost storey, near the sunshine and the stars of night. Do not shut your doors on perfection, or close the shutters on the spiritual life.

MEMORIAL TO MR. CORKRAN.

LAST Sunday evening the service at the Mansford-street Church, which is the successor to the old Spicer-street Mission, was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, when a memorial tablet to the late Rev. C. L. Corkran was unveiled.

The lessons were Psalm xxxvii. and 1 Cor. xiii., and the anthem, "Eye hath not seen," was sung. After the prayer Dr. Drummond, standing by the veiled tablet, said that it was well for them to keep fresh the memory of their saints, and friends had erected that memorial to one who for many years worked in the East of London in the spirit of Christ, which alone could give strength and peace; it was to the memory of a man whom all who knew him revered and deeply loved. He then unveiled the tablet, and Hosmer's hymn, "I cannot think of them as dead," was sung.

The tablet, which is of brass, perfectly simple, but beautifully chased, with a border round the inscription, and set in black marble, bears the following words:—

In Memory of Charles Loftus Corkran, who was from 1848 to 1879
Missionary at Spicer-street, Spitalfields, the first Domestic Mission established in London, this Tablet is placed here by friends and fellow-workers to record their high appreciation of his sterling character, Christian zeal, and life-long devotion to the work for which he was so eminently fitted.
b. 1813. d. 1901.

In the course of his sermon, which was from Psalm xxxvii. 27, "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord," proceeding to speak of Mr. Corkran's character and work, Dr. Drummond first read a letter from Mr. I. M. Wade, an old friend of over sixty years' standing, who wrote of the happiness it had been to him to go down to Spicer-street to help Mr. Corkran in his work, to him always a labour of love. For himself, Dr. Drummond said that his remembrance of Mr. Corkran also went back a long way—to a back parlour in Dublin, with the walls almost completely lined with books, where, as a young man, Mr. Corkran came to breakfast with his father. He had been brought up in the narrowest orthodoxy, and told afterwards of the literal terror with which he used to pass Dr. Drummond's chapel. But when he was led to broader views he did not become a sectarian, but what he always prized was the Christian spirit.

Dr. Drummond then told how, when he came to London as a student at Manchester New College, he saw Mr. Corkran constantly, and felt how noble was the work to which he had given himself. He was a man of large ability and wide views, who might have made a good position for himself in the world, but of him they might say what St. Paul had said of Christ: "For your sakes he became poor, that you through his poverty might become rich." He was a man of deeply devout spirit, which made itself felt through all his work. The most thoroughly happy hours of his student years, Dr. Drummond said, had been spent at Spicer-street, where he was deeply impressed by the spirit that presided there, with kindliness and wise control. All who came in contact with Mr. Corkran felt the deep impress of divine reality, because it was so clear that his whole heart and soul was bowed down before the Unseen Spirit. That devoutness characterised his preaching and teaching, which was not sensational, with none of the arts of the rhetorician. He spoke simply from the heart, and those who came to hear him came for the sake of the higher spirit he had to impart. Speaking from the depths of his own soul he found the depths in others. He was wise in action, not carried away by impulses of benevolence, but always seeking to understand cases of distress and to find means of effectual help. The ultimate roots of poverty and wretchedness he saw in moral causes; and while he welcomed all improvements of outward condition, he knew that true regeneration must come from within. Dr. Drummond also spoke of his love of children and his genial Irish humour, so closely akin to true sympathy, and so great a help in carrying him through his work. He reached an old age, rich in the love and reverence of friends, and had left a pure and beautiful influence. The best prayer they could offer for that church and mission was that that spirit might always abide there and his memory be treasured by those who heard the story of his life, and so would be helped to keep sweet and pure many a home in that part of London. It was their prayer that that fine spirit, which he had caught from Christ, might still come in even fuller and richer measure and bless all in that place.

There was a large congregation, among whom were Miss Corkran, Mrs. Drummond, Mrs. Walter Baily, Miss L. Jones, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. W. S. Preston, Mr. Richard Whiteing, Mr.

Classon Drummond, the Rev. W. G. Cadman, and many other friends and workers.

THE LATE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

AT a meeting of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held on Wednesday afternoon, Mr. David Martineau, in the absence of the President, in the chair, the following resolution, moved from the chair, and seconded by the Rev. V. D. Davis, Chairman of the Indian Committee, was unanimously passed :—

That this Committee, meeting for the first time since the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, desires to place on record its high appreciation of the services he rendered during two and a-half years as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in India, its gratitude and admiration for the devotion with which he gave himself to his mission, as an eloquent exponent of liberal religious thought and spiritual religion, and its sorrow that his labours should have been cut short by death, when the ripeness of his gifts and the wide experience he had gathered gave such promise of yet more fruitful service.

The Committee feel that in thus recording their sense of loss they are united in a common sorrow with many friends both in this country and in India, and they would offer to the members of Mr. Williams's family an expression of heartfelt sympathy in their bereavement.

At a recent meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, a resolution was also passed, expressing sympathy with the family of Mr. Fletcher Williams, and their sense of loss in his death.

The Rev. Frank Walters, in moving the resolution, spoke of the earnestness and ability Mr. Williams had shown in his long career, the striking versatility of his gifts, and his ardour in the work of Unitarian propaganda.

Mr. Walters also spoke of his wide reading and his powers as a popular lecturer, and the ability he showed as one of the editors of the Unitarian Herald. He possessed a wide experience of men and of secular affairs, and wherever he might be settled, he soon found himself in vital touch with the social interests of the neighbourhood. Having referred to his indefatigable work in India, both as a religious teacher and a literary lecturer, Mr. Walters concluded :—

"I only once heard Mr. Williams preach, and that is about twenty-six years ago. I was conducting services afternoon and evening at a place of worship near Newchurch, where he was then settled. I attended his morning service, and I have never forgotten the sweet sermon he preached from the text, "So he giveth his beloved sleep," closing his discourse by reading Mrs. Browning's perfect poem on the words. Little did I think then that I should ever be called upon to speak of the final sleep through which our brother has passed into eternal life. The day's work is over ; the faithful labourer sleeps well, and we thank God for the memory he has left behind."

YOU cannot be so much as honest, unless you have the habit of looking at the other man's end of the bargain as well as your own.—Merriam.

JOKAI'S MANASSEH.*

FEW stories can bear translating, and one feels, in reading "Manasseh," that it does not fully account for Maurus Jokai's fame in his own land, and that probably the necessary limitations of translation are a large part of the reason. And yet there is here such a powerful body of incident, and such strong contrasts of character, that for these reasons alone many will be glad to meet with the book in these days of psychology and problem. There is, however, an additional interest for readers of THE INQUIRER, since they will find themselves in an atmosphere more or less familiar to them, as the hero and many of the characters are frankly Unitarians. A hero Manasseh undoubtedly is—with perhaps a touch of the old G. P. R. James' melodramatic love of surprises—and this is welcome enough to the modern who finds little enough of the heroic anywhere. We all have a subconsciousness that ours is not a great time in history—that there are no heroes possible under the conditions of to-day—and that we must still turn back from the mean realisms of the present to the heroic strains of Arthurian and such-like legends. Yet here comes Jokai with a true hero, original and daring, standing boldly out in the middle, not of the ninth, but of the nineteenth century. In a corner of that mass of incongruities, the Austrian Empire, the Hungarian novelist finds a community of heretics—men and women of quiet strength, big as Saul among the Israelites, faithful as Jonathan, devout as the first disciples. What more natural than a good story, a story of treacherous plans and brave deeds, Viennese brilliance, Torocsko gravity, the race wars of '48, and through it all a tale of firm true love. Quite early in the book one is drawn to Torocsko, Manasseh's home, as he describes the place of the people "who love but once."

On the maps the place is put down as "Torocsko." It is in a mountain gorge, entered by a narrow path along the river-side and through a cleft in the rocks. The northern side of this narrow ravine is clothed with woods ; the southern is a great wall of bare rock, rising in terraces, or giant steps. This barren, naked rock is called the Szekler Stone. Its lower slopes are cultivated, and the ploughshare is slowly forcing one terrace after another to yield sustenance to the farmer. By these cultivated terraces the centuries of the town's history may be numbered. For there is a village there, deep down in the rocky ravine, as if on the floor of a volcano's crater, and in that village live the happiest people in all the world. Strangers find no terms of praise too high for those happy and industrious people. Out of their rocky soil they conjure riches in the shape of iron—the best that can be found in all Transylvania. The same men that fill the church every Sunday, in holiday attire, dig and delve underground the remaining six days of the week. Another secret of their modest wealth is their abstinence from strong drink. There is not a single grog-shop in Torocsko.

This is the town to which Manasseh would bring his high-born bride, a town of simple, earnest people, who live a life of unpretentious reality though they lie on the borders of Islam and Greek Catholicism, and might be tempted to displays.

There are few of us who will not feel the glow of kinship as we read Jokai's description of the chapel in Torocsko. His sympathy is so complete that we could easily change the name for one of our own meeting houses or village chapels, "a simple structure, with four blank white walls, and a plain white ceiling overhead. A gallery ran across each end of the room, and in the middle stood the pulpit with the Communion-table before it." Then follows a description of the appearance both of men and women—especially of their dress. "A Parisian modiste would have been put to the blush by the ingenuity of design displayed by these countrywomen's costumes." And "finally the children came—a splendid phalanx, a company of angels of the Murillo and Bernini type."

The service and sermon are described, but that which few will forget is the impression upon the author of the appearance of that congregation, and its contrast with Rome's grandeur. Seeing that the story is largely that of conversion, through a human affection, of Blanka, the heroine from Catholicism to Unitarianism, no more suggestive summary of the contrast could have been given than is embodied in the description of the Torocsko congregation.

The pride of the Torocsko church is its people. The churches of Rome boast many a masterpiece of early Italian art on their walls, but their worshippers are ragged and dirty. The walls of the Torocsko temple are bare, but the faces of its congregation beam with happiness. No works of sculpture, resplendent with gold and silver and precious stones, are to be seen there. The people themselves are arrayed in costly stuffs, and furnish the adornment of the house.

And some little indication of the primitive and Stundist-like reading of Gospel truths among this people is shown in Manasseh's behaviour at Solferino. He and many of his Torocsko men have been compelled to serve in the Austrian army, and they, during the day of Solferino, have already taken one important post without the firing of a single shot. But when the order to fire on the returning French troops is given,

Manasseh shook his head. Whereupon the whole battalion grounded arms.

"What do you mean ?" cried the major, astounded.

Manasseh raised his hand to heaven. "There is one God !" he cried, using this ancient and possibly pre-Christian cry of the Magyars. All his comrades followed his example.

"What do you say ?" asked the bewildered officer.

"We swear by the God who has said 'Thou shalt not kill !'" was Manasseh's reply.

"But you are soldiers, and on the battle-field."

"We do our duty, we go whither we are ordered, and we can die if we must ; but we will not take human life except in defence of our homes and our Fatherland."

"But, man, the enemy will kill you."

"So be it."

The commander threatened, begged, wept, all in vain. The only reply was "Egyaz Isten !"—"There is One God !"

This incident, apparently the original of, or similar to Mrs. Browning's story of "The Forced Recruit" at Solferino, shows the innate courage and faith of the type which Jokai has chosen. But what is especially noteworthy is the fact that, probably for the first time, this translation places a novel on the English market, with a clearly defined Unitarian for its hero. No convert to a sort of Unitarianism such as we had in Robert Elsmere, but a born Unitarian, proud of his faith, and never hesitating to declare it. And all readers must feel what a gain to Liberal Christianity it would be if such a book were widely circulated, familiarising England with a type of Unitarianism that we may all be proud of. Indeed, if it were only for its work of gladdening our hearts in the thought of holding religious fellowship with such men and women as these Transylvanians, the book would be worth a warm welcome, and deserve perhaps more than has been said of it in this column. THE "HUNGARIAN" SOIRÉE.

A DELIGHTFUL gathering took place at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, when Miss Tagart, as President of the Unitarian Workers' Union and Central Postal Mission, welcomed the members of her Hungarian party, who last summer paid a visit to the Unitarian churches of that country, and a large number of other friends. From near and far (as far as Bridgwater, Bradford and Belfast) members of the party had come up for this re-union, among them being, in addition to Miss Tagart, Miss Teschemacher, Miss E. M. Lawrence, the Revs. T. B. Broadrick, W. J. Davies, E. Ceredig Jones, S. G. Preston, T. P. Spedding, Messrs. Shrubsole, Ward, Ginever, and Wilfred Tayler. Among others who were present at the meeting were Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Mrs. Alfred and the Misses Lawrence, Mr. and Mrs. David Martineau, Mr. and Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Crane (who had also recently been in Hungary), Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Maurice, Mrs. Aspland, Mrs. Mace, Miss E. Sharpe, Miss Brooke Herford, the Revs. Alexander Gordon, F. W. Stanley, F. Allen, Vernon Herford, A. Farquharson, W. Copeland Bowie, and V. D. Davis, Messrs. I. S. Lister, and G. H. Leigh.

After the first social hour the chair was taken by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, who, in an opening address, told of his own visit to Transylvania in 1859, and contrasted the conditions of the country at that time with what this summer's party had found. After Grosswardien there was in those days no railway, and he had travelled in carts without springs, with bullocks as well as horses to get them up the bad hills. Those were days of Austrian tyranny and suspicions of treason, when the hope of liberty was crushed to its lowest depth. He carried messages to several of Kossuth's friends in Hungary, but escaped the police, while a perfectly innocent American, who had excited suspicion, passed several weeks in prison. The closer union between the Unitarian churches of Transylvania and their own churches in England and America, for which they then hoped had been to a great extent accomplished, and both had reaped great advantages. It was a strange feeling for an Englishman to stand in that country and from a hillside to see thirteen or fourteen church spires and know that they were all Unitarian, and to go into towns and villages where there was only one church and to find that the clergyman and the people were Unitarians. Nothing could exceed the hospitality and the enthusiasm with which they, as English people, were welcomed to Hungary. At the end of his address, Mr. Steinthal described the extraordinary effect in those days of oppression which the playing of the "Rákóczy March" had upon the Hungarians; how on one occasion in some public gardens he had asked the band to play the march, and it was called for again and again, amid scenes of the utmost enthusiasm, until the police came upon the scene and cleared the gardens.

He then called upon Miss Lawrence, who played the March, after which Mr. W. H. SHRUBSOLE showed by lantern a large number of photographs taken by himself, Mr. Tagart, and Mr. Spedding during their tour, and a number of other Hungarian pictures, accompanying them with an informal and most interesting talk. The party had been worked so hard that there had been no time to check their photographs, and a good many of the groups were indistinct, but other of the pictures were extremely beautiful, and the large portraits of Bishop Ferencz, Mr. Boros, Mr. Jozan, and one or two of their lady friends, were most cordially greeted.

At the conclusion of the show Miss TAGART said how great a pleasure it was to her to welcome them all to that gathering, and then spoke of the great movement now going on in Catholic countries —Los von Rom—and how the Unitarian movement in Transylvania dated back to the Reformation, and through all persecutions the people had held firm to their religion. In their lives the power of their religion was felt. She told the story of the Unitarian troop at Solferino (to which a reference will be found in our review this week of Jokai's novel), and then told how deeply they had been impressed by Bishop Ferencz, a man of truly apostolic character, of great gentleness, and everywhere held in the highest respect, as had been recently shown, when the King conferred on him noble rank. Miss Tagart told of a letter of thanks she had just received from Bishop Ferencz for their gift of £40 towards the endowment of a new professorship at Kolozsvár, and also of letters of cordial greeting from Mr. Jozan and other friends.

The Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES also spoke, though the hour was too late for the speech he had prepared on the religious aspect of their visit, and the Rev. W. J. Davies then sang in Hungarian a verse of the National Hymn, the whole party taking it up in an English version, made by Mr. Ceredig Jones, as follows:—

Father, with thy mercies crown
Ungarn's fair and fertile land;
When her foes around her frown
Shield her with thy mighty hand.
Dark the past, but brighter time
God hath for the brave in store,
Years of plenty, faith sublime,
And freedom ever more.

It was too late for any further speeches, and the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, brought the meeting to a close.

WAIT not to be backed by numbers. Wait not till you are sure of an echo from a crowd. The fewer the voices on the side of truth, the more distinct and strong must be your own.—Dr. Channing.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

UNDER the auspices of the Western Union a meeting was held in the Congregational Lecture Hall, at Lewin's Mead, Bristol, on Wednesday evening, Dec. 4, the chair being taken by Mr. PHILIP J. WORSLEY, J.P. The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER was present, and made an earnest appeal for the Fund, the objects of which he clearly and carefully explained. It was unanimously resolved "That this meeting, having heard the appeal of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, give their cordial approval to the proposal to raise a Ministers' Superannuation Fund, and resolved to support it by their donations and subscriptions." It was further agreed that the congregations in the district should be respectfully requested to appoint each a special treasurer for receiving the contributions of its members.

A meeting of a representative character was held in George's Chapel, Exeter, on Dec. 5, in support of the National Conference Ministers' Superannuation Fund. Amongst those present, besides the ministers and members of the Exeter congregation, were the Revs. T. B. Broadrick, R. C. Dendy, A. Lancaster, A. E. O'Connor, F. T. Reed, A. Sutcliffe, J. Worthington, and Messrs. A. S. Harris (Plymouth), and J. A. Barnes (Devonport). The Rev. T. W. CHIGNELL presided, and after expressing their pleasure at having the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter with them, called upon him to explain the objects and methods of the superannuation scheme. Mr. CARPENTER concluded his address with an expression of the confident hope that within a few weeks the remainder of the money would be promised. At the conclusion of the address some questions relative to the working of the scheme were asked and answered, and a resolution to support the Fund was then unanimously passed. The meeting ended with a vote of thanks to the Chairman and to Mr. Carpenter. And the company afterwards adjourned to the lecture hall, where the ladies of George's Chapel Social Circle had kindly provided tea.

A meeting in support of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund was held at Bolton in the Bank-street schoolroom on Monday evening, Dec. 9. The chair was occupied by Mr. THOMAS HARWOOD, who was supported by Messrs. J. P. Thomasson, Frank Taylor, J.P., William Haslam, J. J. Bradshaw, Councillor J. Percy Taylor, and Rev. J. E. Carpenter and Rev. C. J. Street. Professor CARPENTER gave an address on "Old Age Pensions for Ministers," explaining the provisions of the National Conference Scheme, which had already found generous support among Bolton friends. The following resolution was proposed by Mr. Thomasson, seconded by Mr. F. Taylor, and unanimously adopted:—"That this meeting accords its best thanks to Professor Carpenter for his address and his unwearied exertions for the institution of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund; and recognising in the fact of the small average stipend of ministers the need of special provision for their declining years, cordially commends the scheme to the generous support of the Unitarian and Free Churches." A vote of thanks to the Chairman concluded the proceedings.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Christmas Appeals.

London Domestic Mission, Bell-street, Edgware-road. — The Rev. B. Kirkman Gray writes:—Will you kindly insert in THE INQUIRER an appeal for the Bell-street Mission. There is more sickness and distress in the district this winter than has been the case in my experience at this time of year, and help will therefore be of even more value than usual. I shall gratefully receive donations for the Poor's Purse and for Christmas entertainments, &c., as also gifts of clothes, toys, books, &c.—25, Carlton Mansions, Portsdown-road, W.

London: Rhyl-street Mission.—Mr. Wilson, of the Domestic Mission, 4, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, N.W., and 5, Claremont-road, Cricklewood, N.W., will gladly and thankfully receive subscriptions to his Poor's Purse and Christmas Parties Funds; Christmas presents for the Sunday-school scholars, which may be sent to the Mission, or to Miss Rayner, Upper Terrace House, Hampstead, new or second-hand warm clothing, and evergreens by the 21st inst., for decorations. The congregational soirée takes place on Friday, Dec. 27, the infants' party on Monday, Dec. 30, and the boys' and girls' party on Friday, Jan. 3. Friends willing to help to amuse and entertain on any of these occasions cordially invited.

Astley.—The third united party of the Leigh, Chowbent, and Astley congregations was held on Saturday, Nov. 30. After tea a meeting was held, Mr. F. Grundy in the chair. The speakers included Messrs. Alderman Pennington, Councillor Yearnshaw, Mather, and Ridyard, and Revs. A. H. Dolphin, J. J. Wright, and P. Holt. The party, which was enlivened by songs and glees, was well attended and most successful.

Bootle.—The annual Sale of Work was held in the Free Church Hall on Wednesday and Thursday, Dec. 4 and 5. The sale was opened by Mr. Charles W. Jones, who delivered a short speech full of cheer and encouragement. On the platform were the Revs. H. W. Hawkes, A. E. Parry, J. M. Mills, and Mrs. Rawlins, and the opening ceremony was presided over by Mr. F. R. Wilson, the Chairman of the Church Committee. The object of this year's sale was the reduction of the remaining debt of £100 on the caretaker's cottage. Including a donation from Mr. Jones and Mrs. Holt, upwards of £45 has been raised. Throughout the proceedings were of the most pleasant character.

Burnley.—The Rev. E. A. Voysey, B.A., has resigned the pastorate of Trafalgar-street Church, Burnley. The resignation has been accepted, and Mr. Voysey's ministry will terminate at the end of February.

Hindley.—Mr. John Harwood, of Pendleton, gave a recital of Dickens's "Christmas Carol" for the first time in the school on Dec. 5. Though the night was very inclement a good company mustered, and all were thoroughly delighted with Mr. Harwood's remarkable impersonations.

Horwich.—On Wednesday evening, Nov. 27, Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave one of his popular recitals, coming for the fourth time to Horwich. The programme was entitled, "A Novel Lecture, followed by Illustrative Recitals," and was rendered in a manner which gave satisfaction and delight to all present. The attendance was good, though not quite so large as on previous occasions, owing to a great counter attraction in the town. The local paper gave a most appreciative report. A Bazaar and Sale of Work was held in the schoolroom on Dec. 5 and 7 in aid of the independence fund, the decoration of the church, and for current expenses. The opener on the first day was Mrs. Charles Taylor, of Bolton. Mr. C. E. Barr presided. The Rev. E. Jolliffe, Wesleyan minister, was present, and offered prayer. Miss Taylor, speaking on behalf of Mrs. Taylor, congratulated the Horwich minister and congregation on the good work that was being done under difficult conditions. The opener on the second day was Councillor David Healey, of Heywood. Mr. Thomas Harwood presided. Mr. Healey's sound and practical remarks produced a very happy impression. When the bazaar closed, the receipts of the sales and donations amounted to a little over £120, which has since been increased to £130—a satisfactory result.

London: Forest Gate.—An excellent entertainment was given in the hall on Saturday evening for the benefit of the church funds. There was a good audience, and the rendering of the various items was much appreciated. The dramatic sketch was admirably played, considerable histrionic ability being displayed. It is satisfactory and encouraging to note that the whole of the performers are members of the church, and have been attracted thereto during the current ministry, thus evincing a deep and vital interest in the church's work. The best thanks of the church and Committee are tendered to them for their generous efforts.

London: Highgate.—The Rev. R. H. Greaves, of Troy, New York, the newly-appointed pastor of this church, is expected in England early in the new year, and will take up his duties on the second or third Sunday in January. A congregational welcome soirée is being arranged for Thursday, Jan. 16, and an induction service, and public meeting for Saturday, Jan. 25.

London: Mansford-street Church and Missions.—The Committee have to announce with regret that in consequence of the health of his wife, the Rev. W. G. Cadman has felt compelled to resign his position as minister, where he and his family have so earnestly laboured for upwards of eight years. The Committee have been fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. John Ellis, of Sheffield, who, they have every reason to hope, will not only continue but extend the good work now being carried on. The change will take place at Lady Day, 1902.

London: South-Eastern Lay-Preachers.—A second meeting was held at 24, Inverness-terrace, on Monday last, sixteen being present, about half of whom were visitors, including members of the Brotherhood Church. Two papers were read, and a very helpful evening was spent.

Manchester District.—A united devotional service was held in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester on Tuesday evening, Nov. 26, to which the members of all the churches of the district were invited. Unfortunately, the notice given was very short, consequently there was not so good an attendance as is usual on these occasions. The service was an impressive one, nevertheless, the devotional part being conducted by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., and the sermon preached by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A. The object of these united services is to draw together friends from the various churches in order that they may feel their kinship, and blend their aspirations in a common worship. Those who do attend appreciate the services very much, and it is to be hoped that in course of time an increasing number will respond to the spirit and desire which actuate the District Association in making arrangements for these special services.

Middlesbrough.—On the 4th and 5th inst. the ladies of Christ Church held a Sale of Useful and Fancy Articles, the object of which was to clear off a debt incurred in the structural alteration and renovation of the schoolroom and vestries, together with increased lighting appliances for the same. The opening ceremony was gracefully performed by Mrs. Sadler, supported by Colonel Sadler, M.P., the borough member. The sale proved most successful, resulting in a net gain of £90. The stalls were presided over by Mrs. Lambelle, Mrs. and the Misses Ward, Mrs. and the Misses MacNay, and the refreshment stall by Mrs. and Miss Wood, Mrs. Martin, Misses Lilley, and Miss Powell. A grant of books kindly made by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association furnished a book-stall, under the care of Mr. A. Newcomb. There were the usual entertainments—art gallery, museum, and the grab-bag, into all of which the young people entered with spirit and enthusiasm. The work here progresses most favourably.

EVERY right thought we think, every unselfish word or action is bound by immutable law to be fraught with good results. But in our walk we must learn to lose sight of results.—Emilie Cady.

NEW BOOK BY MISS FRANCES E. COOKE.

The Story of St. Francis of Assisi

By FRANCES E. COOKE, author of "Story of Dorothea Dix," "Story of John Greenleaf Whittier," &c. Cloth gilt, 1s. net, postage 2d.

"My aim in preparing this little history of St. Francis of Assisi has been to introduce young people to the story of one who was devoted to the carrying out of a great ideal—the realisation of a Christ-like life. That he tried to imitate literally the deeds of Christ does not mar the beauty of his character, or diminish the worth of his example for us. Perhaps now, more than ever, we need the kindling influence of great aims and lofty ideals, and it would surely be well for ourselves and for the world about us if we were to try to carry the spirit of St. Francis into our daily lives."—From Preface.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON Christmas Day the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to preach at Little Portland-street Chapel a special Christmas sermon, the service beginning at 11.15 A.M. The offertory will be on behalf of the Honor Club for Working Girls, in Fitzroy-square, with the excellent work of which many of Mr. Brooke's old hearers at Bedford Chapel have been long familiar, and which is now in need of fresh support. For the sake of strangers in London, it may be noted that Little Portland-street is within a few minutes' walk of Portland-road Station on the Metropolitan, and of Oxford-circus Station on the Central London Electric Railway. Notice of other Christmas Day services will be found in our Calendar.

WE hear good news of the progress of the Superannuation Fund, and there now remains not more than £900 to be secured. If every good intention in this matter may be at once turned into deed, it will be our happiness in the New Year's number to publish the December lists, and show that the end so earnestly desired, and so strenuously worked for, has been achieved.

MR. CARPENTER'S visit to Liverpool last week was crowded with engagements of the greatest interest. On Saturday afternoon he was also in Birkenhead, and laid the memorial stone of the new Unitarian Church in Bessborough-road; we regret that the report of these proceedings has reached us too late for insertion in our present issue, but we hope to give a full account next week.

THE Liverpool meetings began on Thursday, Dec. 12, with an evening reception at the Domestic Mission in Mill-street, given to Mr. Carpenter by the President, Mr. Walter Holland, and Mrs. Holland. The building was most beautifully decorated with plants and flowers, and there was a large attendance of subscribers, workers, and other friends, though many invited guests were kept away by previous engagements and the very inclement weather. The President offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. Carpenter, and recalled the fact that it was he who preached the sermon at the opening of the new buildings nine years ago. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Sir John Brunner, and the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein having also joined in the welcome, Mr. Carpenter responded and spoke of his constant interest in Domestic Mission work. On the following evening he addressed 120 elder scholars and teachers at the Mission, on "How to make the best of Life." On Saturday, after the stone-laying at Birkenhead above referred to, he attended the meeting of the Liverpool Sunday School Society, of which a report will be found under "News from the Churches." On Sunday he preached in the morning at Hope-street Church on behalf of the three Liverpool Domestic Missions, and in the afternoon and evening, at the Mill-street Mission, Sunday School Anniversary sermons. On Monday evening he gave a further address at Mill-street to the audience of 400 on "Temperance." This is the record of a working-man.

A SECOND Blue Book on the subject of the Concentration Camps was published last Saturday, showing for October and November, as was to be feared, an even worse mortality return than in September. In the small camps in Cape Colony there were no deaths, and in Natal very few; but in the Transvaal and Orange River camps the deaths among the white population amounted in October to over 3,000, of which over 2,600 were of children, and in November to over 2,700, of which 2,200 were of children. It will thus be seen that although November was still worse than September, it showed an improvement on October, and we are thankful to learn more fully from the Blue Book, what we reported last week, that the Government are now most strenuously grappling with the worst conditions of the camps. On Nov. 8 Mr. Chamberlain telegraphed to Lord Milner :—

> Please consider whether aggregation of large numbers will not always involve excessive mortality. If so, only remedy is to break up camps into smaller units. Expense must not be allowed to stand in the way.

And subsequent messages show how urgently the Colonial Secretary has insisted that every possible means should be used to prevent a continuance of the dreadful mortality, which during the seven months from the beginning of May reached a total of over 14,000 deaths. On Dec. 1, Lord Milner, in a long message, told what was being done to form new camps near the coast, and with lessened numbers to improve the conditions of the old camps, and added :—

> These measures will, I trust, considerably abate the present deplorable mortality. It will, of course, take some considerable time to get the new camps ready, so we cannot look for immediate improvement from that source. Meanwhile everything will be done which our new improved means of transport admit, to give those remaining in northern camps better and more varied food, ampler hospital and other accommodation, and all the sanitary appliances such as boilers, &c., recommended by the Commission. The increased number of nurses and doctors from home will be a great help, and travelling inspectors are being appointed here to visit all camps, and insure uniform management. I hope for great, if gradual, improvement from these causes, but whatever we do I fear that, though we may lower the death-rate, it will always be high.

There are those who find alleviation from the thought of what has happened in these camps, in the reminder, that if the women and children had been left upon the Veldt, even more of them would have perished; but since it was our troops that "from military necessity" destroyed their homes and laid the land waste, we confess to finding little comfort in that thought.

LAST Saturday's Daily News contained a list of the 5,270 "Free Church" ministers who signed the Peace Manifesto, promoted during the summer by a representative meeting at the Memorial Hall, particulars of which we published at the time. Bearing marks of compromise, and consequent vagueness of expression, we could not feel any great enthusiasm for this manifesto or hope for much good result, but we can well understand that many ministers signed it, glad to make any confession of their desire for conciliation and peace. The clergy of the Church of England were not invited to sign, and that again we took to be a weakness in such a manifesto. We learn from an analysis of the names printed with the list, that among those who signed were 1,100 Congregational ministers, 1,000 Baptists, 950 Presbyterians, 800 Methodists, and 500 Wesleyan Methodists, and among other smaller bodies, 100 Unitarians. We have succeeded in counting not many more than sixty Unitarians—but among so great a number, with innumerable Joneses, Davieses and others, search is difficult.

The Rev. G. Critchley, B.A., lately minister of the Burnt Ash Congregational Church, Lee, preached on Sunday evening at College Chapel, Stepney-green, having undertaken the charge of that pulpit for the next few months. The subject of the sermon was "On a Certain Notice to Quit the King's Chapel," the text being that dramatic incident in the life of the prophet Amos, described in the following verses (Amos vii. 10-13) :—

Then Amaziah the priest of Bethel sent to Jeroboam king of Israel, saying, Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: the land is not able to bear all his words. For thus Amos saith, Jeroboam shall die by the sword, and Israel shall surely be led away captive out of their own land. Also Amaziah said unto Amos, O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there: but prophesy not again any more at Bethel: for it is the king's chapel, and it is a royal house.

Drawing a vivid picture of the prosperous reign of Jeroboam—prosperous at a great cost of oppression and suffering to the poor—Mr. Critchley described the fearless prophet of Tekoa, the plain countryman from the South, who burst in upon their self-complacency at Bethel with his passionate home-truths. As a disturber of the peace, he was met by the cry, "Visionary, begone!" and he was forbidden to speak again in the King's Chapel. That was an experience repeated again and again, as in the case of Jeremiah, and at the coming of Christianity, with those men who "turned the world upside down," and in much more recent times. Taking up the parable, Mr. Critchley referred to certain "King's chapels" of the present day—(i.) The chapel of King Mammon, where everything, pity, honour, righteousness, must give way before commercial interests and the hope of gain. (ii.) The chapel of Popular Christianity, where a glittering mass of sentiment and superstition obscures the divine simplicity and sense that Jesus taught as religion, and where a preacher who, in the name of righteousness, dares to oppose the prejudices or the interest of the dominant powers he is quickly made to understand that he is a disturber of the peace, and, as a visionary, by one method or another, removed from "the King's Chapel," and sent to prophesy elsewhere. (iii.) The chapel of One's Own Self, where behind the wish to do right there are too often reserves of secret selfishness. The only true security, the preacher said, was to have no reserves from God. To-morrow (Sunday) Mr. Critchley is to preach on "Angelic Visitations: Their Purpose and their Use," and on Dec. 29 on "Life as an Education and a Prophecy."

The two practical points are to beware of false standards, and of stifling the warnings of conscience.—Dr. Schofield.

THE TARGUMS.

Sir,—Kindly allow me a few words in reply to Mr. Weatherall's criticisms of my address on the Targums. I will take them seriatim. (i.) My object was not to deal with the Targums "chiefly as helps to the textual critic of the Old Testament," but to tell their story. Incidentally I showed their value to the text critic, pointing out distinctly their subordinate place. If Mr. W. had taken the trouble to understand this, he would have seen how futile are his strictures upon my treatment of the conjectural eadings selected from Haupt's texts. (ii.) I maintain that the Targums are witnesses to the Massoretic text, and they constitute a useful corrective to subjective critics; but I certainly do "not realise that they are almost entirely collusive witnesses"; nor do I know what these words mean. They sound like the echo of some text-book, and have no doubt taken Mr. W.'s fancy. If he means that the Targums are in collusion to support the Massoretic readings, I can only say the idea is ridiculous. With whom, for example, or with what, was the writer of the Targum on Isaiah lii. 13 and liii. 12 in collusion, a specimen of whose work I give on pp. 16, 17 of my address? He completely perverts the meaning of the Hebrew. Yet the text critic, looking through the glass, darkly, of even these perverted words, can find confirmation of the validity of the Massoretic readings. (iii.) I do not adduce Targumic readings to confute Siegfried and the others. I state distinctly that the other versions are against them — against Siegfried, the Syriac and Vulgate; against Cornell, the versions except the Septuagint; against Wellhausen, all the versions. I quoted the Targums to tell my hearers what they had to say, and I showed how they support the Massoretic text. (iv.) For the gratuitous information that "Deutsch does not state that Ezra originated the custom of giving translations of the Scriptures into Aramaic," Mr. W. has my warmest thanks; but I do not see what it has to do with my paper. (v.) That I believe the Babylonian sojourn exercised immense influence on the Jews generally, and especially on the transition of Hebrew into Aramaic, is quite true, and I have yet to see the arguments in scientific text-books that disprove it. Does Mr. W. seriously maintain that the Jews were entirely uninfluenced by their Babylonian surroundings, and came home without the slightest knowledge of Aramaic? That is the only meaning I can extract from his words. If so, his theory is as extravagant as that of those who maintain that they entirely forgot their Hebrew in captivity. Both views are equally improbable. Neither will stand examination. (vi.) That I believe Onkelos to be not a person but a convenient name, is also quite true. Mr. W. ought to know, as a reader of "Scientific Works on the Old Testament," that most modern scholars hold the same view. That one scholar (or even a few) holds the opposite view is not conclusive against it. Dr. Priestley held, to his dying day, that Phlogiston was a real thing; but his holding it did not prove it true. All modern scientific men have abandoned it. (vii.) I maintain strenuously that subjective criticism is always treacherous, and that no conjecture is admissible unless supported by the early documents. At any rate, their verdict must not be against it. To the neglect of this rule is due the mass of unsatisfactory conjectures in Haupt's new texts. (viii.) Finally, I would suggest that Mr. W. should study the Targums themselves rather than take unquestioning the word of text-books however scientific. He would then be better qualified to speak about them.

J. E. Manning.

Sheffield, Dec. 16.

Jesus Christ calls to every poor soul; he calls to every one who bears a human face—"You are the children of the living God, and not only of more value than many sparrows, but of more value than the whole world." The value of a truly great man, as I saw it put lately, consists in his increasing the value of all mankind. It is here, truly, that the highest significance of great men lies; to have enhanced, that is to have progressively given effect to human value. But Christ was the first to bring the value of every human soul to light, and what he did no one can any more undo. We may take up what relation to him we will: in the history of the past no one can refuse to recognise that it was he who raised humanity to this level. Real reverence for humanity follows the recognition that God is the Father of all.—Harnack.

Dr. William Smyth Memorial Fund.—The Rev. C. J. Street (Maythorn, Heaton, Bolton) acknowledges with grateful thanks the following gifts to this Fund, which have been made by readers of The Inquirer:—G. W. Chitty, £5; T. A. and Mrs. Johnson, £1; H. J. Morton, £1; Mrs. Todd Vance-Smith, £1 1s.; Henry and Mrs. Woodall, £2 2s.; A Lady Friend, 10s.; T. Rowlands, 10s.; Mrs. Burridge, 5s.; W. Wilkinson, £1; Mrs. Hall and Friend, £5 10s.; Mrs. Holt, £10; Miss E. G. Holt, £10; Mrs. Worthington, £1 1s.; Miss A. Garrett, £1 1s.; the Rev. J. and Mrs. Howard, £1; Miss Howard, 10s.; Mrs. S. A. Fryer, £1; J. C. Hollins, 10s.; Miss Alice Brown's Sunday-school Class, 5s.; A Friend, £2. Total (including also £19 10s. contributed by twenty-nine members of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton), £64 15s. This amount has been forwarded to Dr. T. Myles, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland, who, expressing gratitude to the donors, reports that over £3,000 has now been received, while a sum of £5,000 is aimed at. The money collected will be vested in trustees for the benefit of the window and children.

Channing House School.—We note in the recently published list of graduates of London University the names of three former pupils of this school. Miss F. Hayhurst and Miss A. Withall have graduated in Arts as B.A., and Miss E. Morphy in Science as B.Sc. We heartily congratulate all three ladies on their success. At the Christmas party held in the school on Saturday, Dec. 14, a large number of visitors were entertained by a Kindergarten display, followed by a concert by the older scholars, after which a dance brought a very pleasant evening to a close.

UNDER THE SNOW.

VIOLETS under the snow,
Waiting their time of birth
Sheltered in buds close curled;
Warmth at the heart of the world;
Roots only waiting to grow,
Under the frozen earth.

Faith lying buried deep
Under a weight of ill,
Waiting its hour to appear
When the soul's spring-tide is near;
Faith lying folded in sleep,
Hidden, but living still.

Hope, with its promise fair,
Bowed down and gloom-o'ercast,
Bending its lovely head,
Patient through darkness and dread;
Hope in the chains of despair,
Waiting till night be past.

Love, smothered long by hate,
Cruelty, lust, and sin,
Waiting to stretch kind hands
Unto all suffering lands;
Love, left forlorn at the gate,
Ready to enter in.

Christ, waiting still to speak
To the wild hearts of men,
Silenced by battle cries,
But with his tear-brimming eyes
Pleading against the wrong;
Waiting so long to be heard,
Striving to speak his word;
Christ, royal suppliant meek,
When shall we listen? When?

Birmingham. THEODORA MILLS.

JOSEPH'S FIRST-BORN SON.

THE Gospel stories of the birth of Jesus, in which reverence, wonder and love found naïve expression, have an imperishable beauty and significance. We hear in them, with ever-fresh delight, an echo of the ideas and emotions that gave birth to them. But the actual facts, of which there are only scattered hints in the stories, have also a claim upon our sympathetic attention. There is in the facts a wealth of religious and poetical meaning, though we only know them in barest outline, and reach them only by general inference. Using our constructive imagination we see the young Jewish workman and his wife—for there is no real ground for supposing that Joseph was an old man—and the wonder and joy with which they welcomed their first-born son, and felt the strange appeal for love and protection in the clinging fingers. It is the old, old story, in its roots older than the human race, yet ever new with every fresh generation. There were also the usual circumstances attending babyhood, the trivial round, the common tasks, weariness and anxiety, and the new-born patience and love to meet the new demands. There were infant wailings in the night, and the toil-worn father's soothings, as well as the mother's lullabies.

"His parents" certainly experienced the prosaic facts of babyhood in all their trivial detail. And there is nothing to forbid the supposition that they also felt its deep poetical and religious significance, and brooding hope. There would be the general anticipations of parents in all ages. And there might have been the timid thought, scarcely venturing into the light of speech, and as natural to "his father" as to "his mother," that their child might perchance, in the providence of God, be "he that should redeem Israel." That thought would be especially natural if there is truth in the Davidic descent of Joseph, which is supported by a few words of St. Paul apart from the conflicting genealogies. And it is a natural though unsupported conjecture, that some aged Simeon or Anna may have habitually spoken of this hope to those who brought their children into the Temple.

All we know of the father of Jesus is that he did not spoil the image of fatherhood for his first-born son, who was afterwards to reveal the significance of the Fatherhood of God; but even in that negative fact there is a wealth of meaning. We know nothing of Joseph's thoughts and parental hopes. But as we look back through the centuries we perceive the wonder and mystery of that baby life, which the parents fondly cherished. From that frail bud of humanity opened out the life of purity and love and nobleness in closest union with God, which we still regard with deepest veneration as our type and ideal of the highest spiritual manhood. Their most soaring hopes could never have approached the reality. It could never have occurred to them that millions beyond their power of computation, through ages longer than the national life of Israel would turn with love and wonder to the thought of their baby. They could not have dreamed that the commemoration of his birth would become a yearly festival, on which the children of unknown tribes of men would rejoice; a sacrament of family love, an added consecration to family life.

The facts are more wonderful and more poetical than even the lyrical beauty and mythical marvels of the birth stories. But it was those stories which directed the mind of Christendom, while it was still plastic, to the birth of Christ; and supplied a mould for the reverent imagination of the ages. The fashioners of those stories little knew the service they were rendering to mankind. And, while we regret the great misfortune of their excluding the father from his rightful place in the world's love and honour, we are thankful for what they have given us, and turn each Christmas tide with inexhaustible delight to their charming and suggestive picture of the real mystery in the birth of Joseph's first-born son.

THE CHRISTMAS HOME-GATHERING.

ONE of the greatest joys of Christmastide is that it is a season of family reunions. Now it is that the sons or daughters who had to leave the old home in search of a livelihood find themselves able to visit the old scenes and the old folk, whose thoughts have gone out to them in many an anxious time and whose hearts have yearned for them in absence. It may be from some place of business in the crowded town that the young man turns his face towards the old home in the country. The journey is cold and tedious, but what matters that when hearts are warm. The village looks smaller and duller than it was wont to do in the days gone by, but what matters that when the loved faces are ready with a look of welcome and all is warmth and cheeriness beside the ancient hearth. The boys and girls from boarding school have already reached the house and right eagerly do they look out for the arrival of bigger brothers and sisters who come along as soon as work and distance will permit. Think of the cheery greetings as each arrives; the eagerness to relieve the new-comer of his bag and hat, and to learn all the news; the curiosity about possible presents; the questions put all in one breath, with no waiting for an answer. And so they gather one by one; perhaps the party is not complete till Christmas morning, when the last straggler comes home after a busy Christmas Eve, and great is his exultation if he arrives before the others are stirring. Then comes the walk in the crisp frosty morning air, while the women-folk of the household are preparing the Christmas dinner, and glad they are to get us out of the way during that harassing time. But what a triumph it is for them when all are gathered round the board hungry as hunters, and the several dishes, about which there has been such anxious thought, are pronounced quite satisfactory. Yes, it is good for us to have these times of re-union. The life of to-day is often a great rush and a great strain upon our powers, and it is well that times of relaxation come to us. It is well that we have these opportunities of keeping in touch with the home influences which have done so much to mould our lives. It is well that friends and kinsfolk should thus gather together to share with one another in the joy and gladness of this season, to talk over their hopes and prospects for the coming days and recall the happy memories of the past.

CHRISTMAS CHEER.

"The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, 'Behold a gluttonous man, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners!'"—Matt. xi. 19.

PROBABLY we are all agreed that there is in our Christmas cheer a tendency to fall in love with Martha and the serving of tables, and to slight her sister Mary, the sitting at the Master's feet and hearing his word.

To hold a supper or dinner in honour of the birth of Jesus, and to celebrate with eating, drinking and merry-making the memory of the Man of Sorrow, the Christ, the Crucified, has seemed to many of us most incongruous. And voices of protest are heard, but seemingly so far in vain, against this method of commemorating the birthday of Christ. It is said that all this Christmas cheer hides from us rather than reveals to us the real spirit of Christianity.

The object of this present essay is to meet this objection, to defend the time-honoured custom of the Christmas Feast, and to explain the seeming incongruity.

In the first place, let us remember that Christmas is the birthday feast, it is not a funeral, it is not Good Friday.

In the second place, that every child of man born into this world must either come amongst us as one that is going to eat and drink; or, if food be refused, cannot stay amongst us. The Son of Man, of necessity, is come amongst us to eat and drink, or else to perish.

In the third place, let us remember that Jesus, in distinction from many other prophets, accepted the necessities of life as blessings, and glorified our nature and its necessities as visible works of God. What others rejected as common and unclean, he rather consecrated and used to the glory of God. It was thus that he seized hold upon the necessity of eating and drinking, and exalted it into a sacrament, into a bond of closest religious fellowship, and an occasion for intimate friendship and communion between man and man, meeting together on a common basis ordained of God for all to be alike in. Whatever else men might differ about, yet all alike must eat and drink. On a basis as broad as this all men might surely be united in one communion. "The Son of Man is come eating and drinking."

There are few Churches founded on a broader creed.

We have next to note, in an age when fasting was a frequent exercise of devotion, and religious teachers, such as the Pharisees and the great prophet John the Baptist, were held in honour for their marked abstinenee from certain food and for their ascetic practices, that a religious teacher who came eating and drinking was likely to have many hard sayings said about him. "Behold a gluttonous man, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners."

Jesus, in telling us of this accusation, seems to imply that it was as false a charge against himself as was that other said of John the Baptist—"He hath a devil."

We may understand Jesus to repudiate the charge against himself, no less than the other against his friend.

He repudiates the charge of excess; but not, I think, of joyous festivity. As contrasted with the asceticism of John which people refused as devilish, he invites men himself to friendly and joyous gathering around the supper-table, only to be accused of gluttony and excess. That Jesus approved of feasting and festivity, no one, I think, who is familiar with his life and sayings will deny. Both his parables and his practice seem to agree about this. He refers to feasts as to good things, and is himself not unwilling to accept an invitation to dinner, and to be seated at meat in a large company. He may perhaps be described as the Prophet of the Supper Table, whose conversations during the meal-time are among the richest; and whose memory, not without his own approval, has been commemorated in a supper, where those who share his spirit of broad human sympathy may gather round the common necessity of life, eat of the same bread and drink of the same cup, and be, here at least, in communion one with another.

The customs of eating and drinking vary from age to age and from country to country; that Jesus accepted such food as was in his day and country held to be necessary, as e.g. wine, does not prove that he would accept wine to-day, do other than bless such food and drink as seemed to his host the best, and to himself not wrong to partake of.

From such a teacher the lessons of self-denial come with peculiar force; and the open scorn and contempt which the great Prophet of the Supper Table always had and always showed to mere eating and drinking as such, and to all such questions as What shall we eat? and What shall we drink? reveal the loftier purpose that he had in view when he hallowed the supper-table, as the Churches have done the Communion, to the highest services of God. His personal refusal at the last supper to drink any more of the fruit of the vine, his warning continually that the life is more than the food, and the body than the raiment; that man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God; his reminder that he had meat to eat that others knew not of, that the cup which the Father gave should he not drink of it? That his disciples must drink of his cup and be baptised with his baptism; these are sayings which intimate something of a salt that never lost its savour at the supper-table of Jesus, an imagery passing from it outwards over the whole of life and hallowing the whole thought of him who taught men to hunger and thirst after righteousness, to be filled with the living waters and satisfied with the bread of God.

As we enter the dining-room, how little do we care what we shall eat or what we shall drink! The flowers, the silver, the vases, the exquisite dishes, the assembled company, the gracious welcome, the charm and fascination of our brilliant hostess banish from our minds all other thoughts. The ordinary sense of eating and drinking is obliterated by the very magnificence of the attention, and by the brilliance of the company that is gathered around it.

So, perhaps, it was at the supper-table of the Master. It was there that men learned to forget what they should eat and what they should drink, and treasured only the remembrance of that loving friend and host, of a heavenly feast, of parable succeeding parable, of wit and wisdom, and the repartee of a divinely illuminated mind, of facts and of fancies and of flights of imagination, a flowing stream of revelation that had filled the soul with a longing to feast for ever on Righteousness and in the Kingdom of God.

So Martha served, and Mary sat at the feet of the Master.

WILFRED HARRIS.

THE TWO CHRISTS.

THERE are two Christs: the Christ of long ago,
Whom Mother Mary bore, and Pilate slew;
And that celestial Christ the holy know,
Soul of their soul, the Vision of the True!
One born in time—a man of mortal mould,
Who waked and slept, who drank of sorrow's wine;
One, all unseen, whose lineaments unfold
In lines of childlike faith and love divine.
From age to age the primal Word of God
Lies deeply hidden in the human breast,
And bourgeons, as the blossom from the sod,
When willing souls obey its high behest!
Then we interpret that indwelling life
By vision of the Christ of Galilee,
When, sore confounded by our earthly strife,
Through the dim mists his radiant face we see.
The Christ of Yore speaks to the Christ of Now;
The Son, the heaven of Sonship opens wide:
And while the rolling years unceasing flow,
The heart of man shall still keep Christmas-tide!

"And Jesus came and touched them. . . and, lifting up their eyes, they saw no one, save Jesus only.—Matt. xvii. 7, 8.

SUCH grace and sweetness with thee dwell,
The tongue to utter breaks its sphere;
The herald tears alone can tell
That earth is heaven when thou art near.

Such grace and sweetness dwell with thee—
The bankrupt gods could tell how much:
Self-banished they ordained to be,
To put all heaven into thy touch.

OBITUARY.

ADMIRAL SIR GEORGE ELLIOT, K.C.B.

THE passing away of one full of years, of simple manly piety, and of serene trust for the great future, is an event that mingles with natural human sadness a dominating sense of reverent joy. Sir George Elliot, who died on the morning of the 13th inst., was in his eighty-ninth year. The infirmities of age had long kept him indoors, but he enjoyed a considerable measure of health and much vigour of mind up to within a few days of the end, and his last illness was not severely painful.

His funeral, which was preceded by a service at the home for his family, conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, was by his own desire as simple as possible. The flag under which he sailed so many years, and portions of his admiral's uniform, lay upon the coffin; other insignia of mourning there were none. He directed that his remains should be cremated and the ashes taken to Niddrie, the Midlothian home of the Wauchopes, to be laid in the grave of his wife, who came of that family.

So fitly the earthly scene closed for one who had long ceased to fear the great change. His public life has been briefly given in the daily newspapers and needs no lengthened comment here. The son of an admiral, the grandson of the first Earl of Minto, Governor-General of Bengal, he entered the Royal navy as a boy of fourteen, saw active service in the China war (1840), and in the Baltic during the war with Russia (1854-5). He became admiral in 1870, was M.P. for Chatham (1874-5), and held appointments there and at Portsmouth. His energies were not, however, confined to official tasks, and subsequent to his retirement from them he took great interest in religious questions, to the study of which he brought a fearless and original mind. For a considerable time he was associated with the Theistic Church, founded by the Rev. C. Voysey, and it was quite late in life when, attracted by the undogmatic principles of Unitarians, he enrolled himself amongst them. Many of our readers will remember contributions to our columns in which he stoutly gave battle against what he termed "the creation theory," and pleaded on behalf of "spiritual Unitarianism." No one could be more modest than he with respect to his inadequate equipment for philosophical debate; but the essays in which he defended his thesis, and which were afterwards collected into a little volume ("God is Spirit, God is Love," 1895), showed to every attentive reader the characteristics of a mind profoundly imbued with love to God and man, and wrestling with all its might against what seemed to him to be derogatory to the divine love and obstructive to piety. This is not the time to discuss the problem; interested readers may turn to his book and consider it for themselves. But it was fit to refer to it here, for in conversation to the last he urged his argument with renewed earnestness and with ever-tenderer affection for mankind. Peace be with him!

MR. HENRY RENDALL.

BY the death of Henry Rendall, at the age of eighty-eight, we lose one of the oldest and staunchest supporters of Unitarianism in Bridport, or, indeed, throughout the West of England. As Sunday-school teacher, as chapel librarian, and as chapel warden for twenty-two years, from 1864 to 1886, he rendered faithful service to the cause, and when the chapel centenary was celebrated in 1894, he was asked by the congregation to preside at the public luncheon, and delivered a fine speech on the worth of our Nonconformist worship. This he was specially qualified to do, for never was worshipper more regular in his attendance every Sunday morning, even after a slight deafness made it difficult for him to hear all that was said. In business he was a twine and net manufacturer, and his whole career was a refutation of the faithless saying that no man can succeed in business and keep a clear conscience. He was content to succeed only so far as he could do so with a clear conscience. He did not make a fortune, but he carried on a prosperous industry, and his golden wedding, which was celebrated this year, called forth much heartfelt appreciation of the relation which had long existed between him and his workpeople. This was the more gratifying because he required of others the same high standard of integrity which he exacted of himself. He could not tolerate shiftiness, and could keep a strict watch and, when necessary, speak a sharp word. But he was always just, and just in a way that was universally recognised as just, for his was that fine type of character which adds generosity to justice, and still does all in the name of justice, and would feel anything less unworthy. Another noteworthy characteristic was his culture. He read much, and always read good literature. He had been early started in the right path by the training of a former Unitarian minister of Bridport, the Rev. G. B. Wawne, and to the end of his life he would never read anything which he considered rubbish. In 1851 he married Julia, daughter of E. F. Pratt, of Glastonbury, who survives him, as do also three sons and three daughters. The funeral was on Dec. 12, the service being conducted in the Unitarian chapel, and the interment in the Bridport Public Cemetery, and was largely attend by his fellow-townsmen as well as by his fellow-worshippers.

MR. HENRY HOLLAND.

THE congregation of the Trafalgar-street Unitarian Church, Burnley, lost a devoted member by the death on Sunday last of their vice-chairman, Mr. Henry Holland, who passed away in his eighty-third year. A native of Padiham, the whole of Mr. Holland's working life was spent at Burnley, where he was well known in the building trade as a skilful joiner. An obituary notice in the Burnley Gazette speaks of him in the following terms:—

"He was a type of man we are apt to think is rapidly passing away—strong, upright, singularly simple and honest, a thorough workman, who took a pride in work, and would not tolerate any skulking on the part of the men or any scamping on the part of his employers. But he was something more than a capable artisan—he was an artist. Many fine specimens of hand-railing—that highest branch of the joiner's art—done by him in this district, remain to testify to his artistic skill, and the oak panelling and wainscotting in the Manchester and County Bank also stands out as a monument to his skill and capacity."

Mr. Holland was also a musician, and in his younger days "Holland's Quadrille Band" was well known in Burnley, and at festivities at Towneley Hall. He worked at the bench to within four or five years of his death, and leaves a memory that will be gratefully cherished.

LOVE, THE WORLD-REDEEMER.

Tune, "Dewsbury."

LOVE, the World-Redeemer,
Sought the lowly place,
Stooped above the manger,
Kissed the infant-face.

Love, the World-Redeemer,
Knelt by Mary there,
Gave her God's own wisdom
In her mother-prayer.

Love, the World-Redeemer,
Walked beside the youth
Crowned with power and meekness,
Purity and truth.

Love, the World-Redeemer,
Kept his manhood true,
Strong in trust and courage,
Wise to dare and do.

Love, the World-Redeemer,
Filled his human breast
With compassion's yearning—
"Come to me and rest."

Love, the World-Redeemer,
Sent him holiest faith,
Followed him triumphant
On through shame and death.

God, in Thy great mercy,
Let our spirits move
With the patient passion
Of this mighty Love.

J. L. HAIGH.

EVERY impulse of beauty, of heroism, and every craving for purer love, fairer perfection, nobler type, and style of being, than that which closes like a prison-house around us in the dim, daily walk of life, is God's breath, God's impulse, God's reminder to the soul that there is something higher, sweeter, purer yet to be attained.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Something about Christmas. For the Little Ones.

A HAPPY CHRISTMAS to you! dear children. How often do we say this good old wish to each other when the eagerly-looked for day comes, and sometimes we should think how we can each best help to make Christmas a happy time. Snowballing, and presents, Christmas trees, and Christmas parties, and all kinds of wonderful surprises! These are the good fortune of some little ones at Christmas; but, after all, happiness does not depend upon them, and we have all known children, who have no such enjoyments, who were really far happier than were those who were laden with gifts and treats and who seemed to have nothing left to wish for; for all depends upon whether we have a loving, helpful spirit within us which makes us forget ourselves and try to make other people happy.

I think you will like to read a fairy story in verse, which numbers of children in America have been reading lately. The verses are called "Grey or White," and here they are:—

There was once a rabbit with silver fur,
Her little grey neighbours looked to her;
Till she thought with pride in the moonlit wood,
The reason I'm white is because I'm good.

"Oh, what shall I do?" cried a tiny mole,
"A fairy has tumbled into a hole,
It's full of water and crawling things,
And she can't get out for she's hurt her wings.

"I did my best to catch hold of her fur,
But my arms are short and she's still in there;
Oh, darling white rabbit, your arms are long,
You say you're good, and I know you're strong."

"Don't tell me about it," the rabbit said;
She shut up her eyes, and her ears grew red.
"There's lots of mud, and its sure to stick,
Because my fur is so long and thick."

"There's plenty of water," the wee mole cried,
"There are shining rivers from moorland wide,
Dew from the sky and the dear grey rain,
And the fairy to kiss you white again."

"Oh dear! oh dear!" sobbed the poor little mole,
"Who will help the fairy out of the hole?"
A common grey rabbit popped up from the gorse:
"I'm not very strong, but I'll try, of course."

His little tail bobbed as he waded in,
The muddy water came up to his chin;
But he caught the fairy tight by the hand
And sent her off safely to fairy land.

But she kissed him first on his muddy nose,
She kissed his feet, and his little wet toes;
And when day dawned, in the early light,
The little grey rabbit was shining white.*

I hope you like these verses as much as I do. Do you not know some children like the grey rabbit? They are always ready to help and trying to make people about them happy. See how the white rabbit thought about no one except herself and her own looks and comfort, and then see how the dear little common grey thing popped up when help was wanted, and said "I'm not very strong, but I'll try, of course." Can you tell what the poem means when it says that the little kind-hearted grey rabbit, that had no silver fur, was nevertheless shining white when the day dawned?

* E. R. in the "Golden Chain."

Now for a little Christmas story with just the same sort of meaning. Charlie was an errand boy. Never mind his surname. Everybody called him Charlie; he was such a kind, willing little fellow. Being only an errand boy, he earned very small wages, and they were needed to help to pay the rent of the tiny house in which he and his widowed mother and his little three-years-old sister lived. But all the year he had been saving up the odd pennies that were sometimes given to him, in order to buy his mother a warm pair of gloves at Christmas. Charlie thought no other boy ever loved his mother so much; and as Christmas drew near, every night when he went to bed he counted up the precious money, and thought how he would go on Christmas Eve to buy the gloves, and what a joy it would be to give them to her and see her wearing them.

But when he ran home to dinner one morning he found his little sister in tears. She was very small, and neither so patient nor so wise as she would be when she was a little older. She had seen children as small as herself, in the streets that morning, laden with presents, and there was a beautiful little doll in a shop window she did so want. Poor Charlie! there was a lump in his throat and tears came into his eyes. "All right, Mollie," he said, "you shall have the doll." And so on Christmas Eve there was no money for mother's gloves. Do you think she cared for this when, the next day, her boy threw his arms round her neck and told her how he had been saving all the year because he loved her so?

It is the kind thought and the loving word that make Christmas bright and beautiful. So once more a happy Christmas, and let us all do our best to make it so.

FRANCES E. COOKE.

MARIE'S CHRISTMAS EVE.

IT was Christmas Eve; and beautiful, frosty weather in Lihou Island, a tiny place off the coast of Guernsey, reached at low tide by a path made of big stones. In a cottage on Lihou there lived a fisherman, his wife and little girl called Marie. They were very poor and very happy. Marie was full of joy to-day, because mother was going across to Guernsey to buy things for Christmas. It had struck seven and the moon was shining when she crossed the stone causeway; and Marie tood watching her for a minute before she went back to the cottage to see about father's supper, for he was still out fishing.

She had just stirred the soup in the big saucepan which stood on a three-legged iron stand in the fire of dried sea-weed, when the door opened and her father came in. He was tall and big, and had kind blue eyes and little yellow curls all over his head; Marie just adored him. After supper, the two had a romp; and then he fell asleep in the cosy old armchair by the hearth, and Marie sat on a wooden stool, knitting a long blue stocking. She was ten years old, rosy and golden-haired. This evening she was full of thoughts. By-and-bye she let her knitting drop on the floor; and rising, she tiptoed across the kitchen, put on her sabots, opened the door and found herself at once on a wide common. To her surprise, a dense silvery fog covered everything and dimmed the light of the moon. But she only stopped to shut the kitchen door softly; then she ran along till she came to a tiny stable under a tall hedge. She lifted the latch and went in. There, munching hay, side by side, stood a small beautiful cow, and a darling little calf. Marie said a sweet good-evening, in Guernsey-French language, to the cow; then she patted the calf and coaxed it till it turned its pretty head and listened to her. "Dear Calf," she said softly, "do you know that this is Christmas Eve? A long time ago—oh, years and years ago—there was a baby born in a stable where cows lived and little calves like you. And the baby was so pretty and so sweet. It just crowed all the time its mother was dressing it. And I know the calves licked its little feet; and it tried to poke its little fingers in their eyes, just in play. And by-and-bye shepherds came to see the baby, because God had told them to, and that the baby was going to grow up the kindest and best man that ever was. Well, Calf, what do you think? The shepherds brought dear little lambs with them, and one poor naughty black sheep that couldn't be trusted out of their sight. And the sweet baby, who was called Jesus, you know, was just as playful with the black sheep as with the white lambs; and so it was so grateful, that when it got back to the fields it was never so naughty again. There, now I have come to tell you all this that I've thinked and thinked by the fire. But, Calf, listen! Don't turn your head away and eat just yet! Now, I'll tell you something that my mother told me this very morning."

She leant her golden head against the brown calf and spoke on softly:—

"Ever after Jesus was born in a stable, cows and calves kneel down when it is twelve o'clock on Christmas Eve, because they remember that God sent Jesus to his mother and father and to all the people to teach them to be good. Ever since then mother says that cows have remembered it, you know. And, to-night, in Guernsey, all the cows and calves will kneel down. So, dear Calf, I came to remind you just in case that your mother might forget to tell you. I hope she won't mind."

Marie moved away to a heap of hay stacked in a corner, and gathered a big armful of it together.

"There!" she cried, putting it down before the Calf, "that's for you to kneel on, Chérie, when it is twelve o'clock. And I'm going to get some for your mother."

She pulled out two big heaps of hay for the mother cow; and then, with a kiss on the white star of the Calf's forehead, she stole out of the stable, and ran back across the common to the cottage, where her father was still fast asleep before the fire. But he soon woke up, and then she told him what she had done. He smiled and kissed her, oh! so tenderly, and then he told her to go to bed, because mother would be home late. Like an obedient child she went at once, and you may be sure she did not forget to Hang Up Her Stocking for Santa Claus to see when he came in a boat, across from Guernsey, all in the black night, with a shining star on the mast of his boat, and toys and sweets for Marie.

The child woke in the middle of the night, sat up instantly, for at once she thought of her stocking. She slept in a tiny cupboard of a room inside the kitchen; and she was surprised to see through the half-open door that a light was burning in there yet. Was it Santa Claus with the toys? Had he been to fill her stocking? Her little fingers trembled with excitement as she felt along the side of the wooden bed where her stocking was pinned. She found it. She squeezed it, but it was empty. Santa Claus had not yet been. Oh, if she could only see him, with his red cloak and hood, his white beard, his fur-gloved hands! She crept out of bed, and opened the kitchen door wider so that she could see better. Her father sat on the jonquière or green-bed smoking his pipe. Mother knelt before the hearth, bending over . . . over what? Marie crept in, closer, closer to the vraicq fire; for there lay a lovely babe, in its tiny shirt, kicking, crowing. Its dimpled hands were clutching mother's wedding-ring finger. Its wee yellow curls tossed like gold on the old rug—its pink feet and fairy toes lay on mother's lap.

Marie threw herself beside the babe.

"It's Jesus!" she said, softly, folding her hands, "it's the child Jesus. Did God give him to you, mother?"

Father and mother started; for they had been so taken up with the baby that they had not noticed Marie before.

"My blessing," said mother in her sweet voice, "it is not Jesus, but it is one of his little brothers that God has given to us three to live with us in Lihou. His father and mother died; and the darling was going to be taken to the hospital this very Christmas Eve; but it happened that I knew about it, and father and I said we would take it. I went to town to fetch it. Kiss him, my sweet one!"

Marie covered the baby with kisses, and then she begged for a stocking to pin up by hers, that Santa Claus might give the little brother some toys and sweets, too.

"Mother," she said, as she nestled down in bed again, "what a lovely Christmas Eve! How kind God is—to let the cows and calves and all the animals have nice stables and hay—and to send me a little baby brother—all on a Christmas Eve!"

ELLEN MARY ROBIN.

THE CABIN-BOY'S CHRISTMAS EVE.

FROM THE GERMAN.

IT was Christmas Eve. The beams of the setting sun were shed, not upon a white winter landscape dotted with towns and villages, ice-bound streams and snow-laden forests, but upon a wild stormy sea. How the waves seethed and rose in great mountains, crested with foam! And overhead dark ragged clouds were driven before the wind, while now and again heavy showers of icy rain were dashed in the sailors' faces. For a large sailing ship was struggling through the storm, the brig Augusta, homeward bound, but yet many hundreds of miles away.

And it was Christmas Eve. Underneath the rough weather-beaten exterior of the men there were loyal hearts, and tender feelings, with thoughts of wife and child, or of Christmases in the old home long ago. But it was worst of all for Franz, the little cabin-boy. He was up in the rigging with some of the sailors, putting something right with the sails. The tossing of the ship was nothing to him. The driving storm did not terrify him, he was used to that; it was something else that brought the look of trouble to his face. It was the first time he had spent Christmas away from home, and that was why he so often cast longing looks out over the sea as if the little village among the hills must appear above the dark waters. And now it seemed to him as if he heard through the storm the distant sound of bells, the Christmas bells at home; and old and young, great and small, hurry over the crisp snow to the little village church, and through the brightly-lighted building the familiar Christmas hymn echoes joyfully as the old pastor reads the beautiful Christmas story. "Well, lad, what a stupid face you are making; you're never crying?" growled his neighbour; and, ashamed, Franz looked down and set to work again.

Then they went forward to the cabin. No Christmas-tree shone to greet him; there was only the oil lamp with its dull flickering flame. Where could a tree come from, or anything that could have been used instead of a tree? There were no presents either. The captain had told the cook to make an extra brew of hot grog, which Franz did not like; and there were pancakes too, which he did like. That was all that they did to celebrate Christmas. The little oil lamp had to take the place of the burning tree, and instead of the delicious scent of fir branches there was the tobacco-smoke from the sailors' pipes, while the noise of the storm was their only Christmas music. Franz, who had "cleared out" the last pancake, looked round him as if he thought something was wanting. He expected Christmas songs and Christmas cheerfulness; but nothing of the sort came. Some of the old sailors had enveloped themselves in such a dense cloud of tobacco-smoke that their faces were no longer visible; others, enlivened by the grog, told how and where they had spent their various Christmas Eves—one on the polar seas, another at the Equator, a third on the mast of a wrecked ship, a fourth among the Chinese, one even among the cannibals.

Franz thought that the best thing he could do was to get into his bunk, and the others, who had not to be up on deck did the same, and drew their woollen coverlets over their ears in order to sleep away their Christmas Eve. For a time there was silence in the cabin; but before long a face looked out from one of the bunks, then shoulders appeared and a slender young figure climbed down carefully and noiselessly in order not to waken the others. It was Franz. He stood still for a moment and listened, then looked at the other bunks, but from each one he heard heavy breathing or a subdued snore.

Satisfied, the little fellow nodded his head, then stole to the table, took out of his trousers' pocket three candle ends, which he had been carefully saving up for a long time, lighted them at the oil lamp, and then stuck them on to the table. How his eyes shone with pleasure while he looked, as if transfigured, into the three little flickering lights! They were his Christmas-tree candles, and now he was going to celebrate Christmas, but all by himself. The celebration earlier in the evening with the tobacco-smoke and grog had not been to his taste; he was used to quite other things at home.

With a thoughtful face he took out of the pocket of his woollen jacket the little Testament which his mother had packed in his chest, not down at the bottom in a corner, but at the top, where it would be easy to find.

And now he read the whole Christmas story through, and the joy of it was reflected in his face as he shut the book and sat gazing at his burning candles. His thoughts flew far across the sea to his father's house; he wondered whether the candles had burnt out on the tree, or whether they were still shining on the bright faces of his brothers and sisters. And his parents, his dear father and mother, wouldn't they think of their eldest boy? The child was so lost in thought that he did not notice that for some time a grey-haired old sailor had been watching him from one of the bunks. But when a heavy sea swept the decks, and the ship suddenly heeled over to one side so that Franz fell backwards with a crash and the bench with him, then he saw to his dismay that old Jan was looking at him; and worse still! more heads were lifted and all the men were awake.

Poor Franz stood and waited for the expected storm of abuse with trembling knees, and a face red as fire; perhaps blows too, for he had disturbed them in their sleep. But for some moments nothing happened. If Franz had not been so alarmed, he would have seen that the awakened sailors were opening their sleepy eyes wide, and were staring in astonishment first at the candles and then at him. At last one said: "Well, youngster, whatever are you doing?—having a Christmas, eh?"

"Yes, I was having my Christmas," stammered Franz, "but I won't make any more noise—I won't, indeed," and his voice sounded as if tears were not far off.

"Well, well, don't howl!" sounded reassuringly from the bunk. "But what's that little bit of a book you were reading in?" and the sailor nodded inquiringly towards the table.

Franz picked up the "little bit of a book" and said, "That's the Testament; it has got the Christmas story in it."

"H'm, the Christmas story—well, read it aloud to us."

The lad had not expected this, and half incredulously he gazed at the sailor. Could he have heard right? Did the man really mean it? Then another said in a mocking voice: "Aren't we going to be pious now?" But another called out: "Yes, yes, read it;" and two others, who were already sitting up, cried: "Read it!"

How gladly Franz did it! At first he was very shy, and stammered as he read, but soon he got on better, and when he came to the verse, "For unto you is born this day," he forgot his audience, and his clear voice rang through the cabin as if he had been one of the real angels. As his eyes were fixed upon his book he did not see the changing expression on the brown faces, and that even the sailor who had mocked was listening quietly. It was a half-forgotten, but yet familiar, story which they listened to, and it seemed to come to them like an echo from their young days. How many years was it since they had last heard it?

When Franz had finished reading, there was a deep silence, the only sound being of the storm outside. Jan, the boatswain, passed his hand over his eyes and said: "Well, now we must sing, that's part of the business." "Yes, let's sing," said the others, in chorus, "and you must start us, Franz." The sailor who had mocked dived into his seaman's chest, for it had suddenly struck him that he had a book with songs somewhere. He found it, but, unfortunately, though there were plenty of sailors' songs in it, there were none about Christmas. However, it did not matter, for Franz knew plenty by heart, and recited each verse before singing it.

The sailors had not particularly sweet voices, the singing of some was like a deep growl, and sometimes it sounded like old rusty iron, but in spite of that there was a hearty ring about it, and it sounded really well with the clear bell-like tones of the boy's voice swelling above the deep bass of the men. They must have heard on deck, too, for one dripping figure after another in sou'-wester and oilskins appeared for a moment at the cabin-door with faces full of astonishment. At last the skipper himself came in, but they did not let themselves be disturbed, and went through to the last verse, when the boatswain said: "Yes, sir, we are celebrating Christmas Eve." Then to Franz: "Now, my lad, another Christmas carol; d'you know that one, 'When shepherds watched their flocks by night'?" The boy cast a shy, questioning glance at the stern skipper, but he only growled: "Set to, lad," with not nearly such a fierce expression as usual.

So Franz began, and, wonder of wonders, the skipper joined in, and also another of the sailors who had come in dripping from the deck. There would have been no end to it, if Franz's stock of hymns and carols had not come to an end. The sailors had got into the mood for singing, and seemed as though they would never tire. When they left off, they one after another began telling about their children, whom they supposed would have been celebrating their Christmas at home, and their faces shone with quite a different light to that which had enlivened them when sitting over their grog.

The three candle-ends had burnt down, and the men at last turned in again. Franz also was back in his bunk. What a splendid Christmas Eve it had been, even without a tree, and in spite of the storm! Yes; he had to thank the rough weather for it, for if he had not tumbled over and made such a noise he would have had his Christmas Eve alone, and his mates would have had none of it.

When he at last went to sleep it was to dream of blazing Christmas tapers, the scent of fir-green and gingerbread, and the chorus of angels singing "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, goodwill to men."

And that was Franz's Christmas Eve.

CHRISTMAS.

Though Christ a thousand times in Bethlehem be born,
If he's not born in thee, thy heart is still forlorn.

The cross on Golgotha will never save thy soul :
The cross in thine own heart alone can make thee whole.

TO-MORROW is "Peace Sunday," and Wednesday is Christmas Day. Three years ago we could write with unclouded heart of the "Joy of Christmas," and indeed with a new-born hope, because of the promise of the TSAR'S Conference of Peace ; but when the next Christmas came we had to write of an "Embittered Joy," for those were dark days of mourning in many homes, and of sorrow and anxiety for our whole people, and the desolation of War was in South Africa. Last year it was the same, and now over a third Christmas the same shadow hangs.

It seems indeed that the miserable struggle must be drawing to a close, and that the worst horrors of the actual conflict are over. The land is desolate indeed. Some thousands of the burghers are still in arms, but by far the greater number who have not fallen in the war are prisoners in exile ; and if now they were brought home again, what would they find where their home once was ? How many of them would have to mourn their little ones, among the thousands that have perished in the Camps ? And if the war is nearly over, ominous clouds must long hang over that unhappy land, and it will be the labour of years to make a true peace, to purge away all bitterness, and on the ruins of irreparable wrong, to build up a new and better life.

And in this country, if wisdom may prevail toward that hoped-for end, there must yet be grievous and heavy burdens to bear, not only in the memory of what has been, and of so many blighted homes, but of actual impoverishment, of progress hindered, works of beneficence crippled, and of the hard times that must surely come.

"Peace on earth, good will toward men" is the Christmas prayer throughout the world. How shall we now make it our prayer ? With sorrow surely in every generous heart, whatever conflict of opinion there may be as to the causes of the war, and the incidence of guilt, and with the humble and earnest desire to judge righteous judgment, to hasten mutual understanding and conciliation, with readiness to bear the burdens which these calamitous years must inevitably bring.

With sorrow that may not be put away we are still obliged to keep our Christmas ; but as in the house of mourning there is yet the tender desire that the children's happiness shall not be marred, and with a new depth of feeling every opportunity of kindly ministering to others is gladly grasped, so we may now give ourselves to the rejoicing of our little ones, to the gladness of their innocence and the hope which ever freshly springs with them, and even more, with the passion of a great pity, to every effort to bring relief to suffering, the light of a better hope to those who mourn, and to the sharing in true brotherhood with the down-trodden, the poor and lonely, of all that makes life rich and beautiful.

And out of such giving of ourselves must spring a deeper and a holier joy, strong even to lift off the burdens of sin and shame ; for therein we come to the secret of Christ.

The cross in thine our heart alone can make thee whole.

There are many needs close at home calling to us for help, and for each one the first requirement is that we enter into the secret of unselfishness and learn with CHRIST the blessedness of giving. That may well cover all—the giving of means to the full measure of our capacity, the giving of service as faithful citizens and helpers of our brethren's need, the giving of ourselves to GOD in humble self-surrender and love and trust, and to our neighbour in true brotherly love.

CHRISTUS DOMINUS.

THE birds and flowers and whispering trees
Have told your name to the passing breeze ;
Whatever else might be your name,
Your name, said they, was Love to them ;
Whatever else your name may be,
Your name, sweet child, is Love to me.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

IMMANUEL.

OF all explanations of Christmas Day the least adequate is that which is content with describing it as the birthday of Jesus of Nazareth. We have to do with something more than the beginning of an historical life, with the first appearance of a Person upon the stage of the world. We may, if we will, observe the day in this sense, we may make it the commemoration of a single distant fact, but the least reflective cannot suppress some astonishment that, if this be all, such a day survives for remembrance.

The truth is that the Christian Festival of the Nativity is a day not of one, but of two nativities. It marks the birth of an historic individual, and it marks also the new birth "of water and the Spirit," of an historic community, and the beginning of a kingdom. It is this new birth that gives significance to the first birth ; for us there were no first birth at all except through transmission by the second. The meaning of Christmas is not exhausted in St. Matthew's "Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise," or in St. Luke's "And Mary brought forth her first-born son." All significance is wanting in these statements until we have added to them such as these, "It was the good pleasure of God to reveal His Son in me" (Gal. i. 15), and "That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld and our hands handled, concerning the Word of Life—and the life was manifested unto us" (1 John i. 1, 2). Here is their true commentary. Not Generation, but Manifestation, is the interpreting word ; not the manger in the inn, but the heart of St. Paul ; not the shining beacon over Bethlehem, but the Light illumining the spirit of St. John.

It is the hour of festival. There is the sound of carols and thankful songs. Wherein is the thanksgiving ? There is no thanksgiving where is no gift, or, if gift has been, where is no perception of its preciousness. There is only sound in our thanksgiving if we have not received. For what shall we give thanks ? Shall it be for what was given to Mary, and shall we appropriate the Magnificat by efforts of the historic imagination ? Shall we with like endeavours achieve a gratitude for the heavenly vision on the Damascus road, or for the Word that touched the hands and filled the ears of John ? Shall we lift disinterested anthems, thanking God that unto them was born a Saviour, which was Christ the Lord ? Nay, hymns to the sun were never framed by the blind. The light of heaven is not sweet by hearsay, but by vision. It is spectacle, not narrative. If we make not thanksgiving at this hour for a gift which is our own, we do but beat the air. We must have seen it with our eyes and handled it with our hands and heard it with our ears. The Life must have been manifested, and the scene of the manifestation must have been our own hearts. The people that walked in darkness are not those who travel across a written page, they are our native passions. No Saviour is born anywhere to-day of whom we need take account if the place of his nativity is not found in our own bosoms.

If we have been in the darkness we can witness to the rising of the light. If we have felt the urgency of a great need, we can rejoice in its satisfaction. If we have been face to face with our own weakness, we can hail the Strength that has made us strong. If amid the welter of outward things when hope has flickered and confidence fallen away we have seen moving the form as of a Son of Man, and to-day we are not the world's but our own, and masters of our destiny; if One has come, and, destroying our house of pride, has straightway restored it to us as a temple within which, for the first time, the Divine Tradition has passed into the Divine Voice; if the glory of God has shone for us in the face of Jesus Christ, then is the Feast of his Nativity come indeed.

Let it suggest to others, if they will, the theme of transcendent happenings and obscure embassies from the supernal world. Others, again, if no more is possible, let it prompt to historical reminiscence and admiration of what has been. Their speech is as of things that are out-of-doors and very far away. Whereas the blessing of this Feast is domestic, and what gives it life has passed under our own roof.

FROM A LETTER TO A FRIEND AT THE ANTIPODES.

So Christmas—the dear northern Christmas—is back again, and you so far away; yet never a Christmas but you will be keeping it with us. Insensibly one turns over the old times before the round earth lay between us.

You—sitting, perhaps, back to stem on the shady side of a kauri or a gum tree, while the children are rollicking in the river—are dreaming of other children of long ago, and memory sits down to her phonograph and gives you their laughter as crisp as if they were clambering on the branches over your head. You will not fail to remember how with a touch of homely ceremony the Yule log was brought in and set on the bright coals. What crackling and blazing soon followed as the dry bark caught fire—what merry crackle of laughter and song meanwhile! Slowly the flames penetrated the timber and clove it in gashes from end to end. The wood, as we watched it, changed into little bricks of fire, now blushing crimson-gold, now, in a whiff of air, chilled to impalpable, silvery ash. Ring by ring, from bark to pith, from the tree's last autumn to its first spring, the dry log burnt away in the glow, responding now and then to the intrusive poker with a shower of angry sparks.

Circle by circle—so the story goes of what once was life of ours and in the natural course of things has burnt out. Only, whatever of us disappears, God grant the heart may be imperishable. Circle by circle we loosen hands and vanish, even in the midst of the radiant warmth of love. Circle within circle, while each one is to himself the point in the centre to go last of all.

Somehow, amidst all the mirth and feasting, dance and song, you and I seemed to edge in or edge out an interval; but it had no time, it was an interlude of the soul when we sat before the crumbling log silent, each for himself seeing, in the embers, faces, cities, and ways of men, shadows of sin, glories of love.

Sometimes, too, late at night, there came a restful release from our energetic mirth, when the lights were turned low, and by common consent the talk of everyone almost ceased as we clustered round the hearth. A sacred spirit of fellowship took hold of us, and the notes of a carol on the snow outside, or a timely hint from aged lips of the shepherds watching by night, and the inn where there was no room, solemnised our thoughts, and silently peering into the fire like worshippers round an altar of reconciliation, old and young sank for a little while into a quietude of love and awe.

The hearth became holy to us. There was something of another world about everything at Christmas. After all the dividing paths and duties and cares of the year we seemed to have come so mysteriously near to one another. There was one joy between us—one love penetrating us. Every feature revealed it, and, as one of the nestling group protected her face from the heat, "her outstretched hands smiled also." We felt the beauty of Something more than ourselves. We had rallied for a game, and God had joined in. I say it with reverence. Words are inapt. I think you felt something of the same childish inability to put into language this hallowing obsession of peace and goodwill and great joy in the midst of the home.

Some of us, in our own minds, perhaps, called the Bethlehem legends poetry—simply poetry. But if so they were more rather than less true to us. True to us no less than true of Jesus and Mary. God is with us. Unseen presences glorify the air around. We ourselves are miracles.

At the time it was a case of least said most felt, but you, I think, will rightly interpret my meaning when I say that round the Christmas fireside the face of God was unveiled within the soul. Was it because some of us were children with eyes still tender to things which we have learned since not to see? Or was it that in this fulness of life and warmth of hearts we were able together to melt some of the frozen music of heaven lying about us? You have read "Rabelais," and will recall the story of the frozen sounds. Is not one of the functions of love to melt silence into song? Howsoever it may have been, the defining line between human and divine vanished and home became heaven.

There is no fireside in the Bible, but we do not need to read about it. God comes to us in our firelight as He used to come to the folk of old in the flames of their altars.

But the gain is on our side. He entered their temples. He enters our homes. Daily, hourly, of course, He is in all homes. Nor does He wait for the festival, or pass the cottage door on His way to the mansion. Only casually, in deepness of joy or keenness of suffering, we catch sight of Him. Do you know Austin Dobson's "Angel Court"?—

In Angel Court the sunless air
Grows faint and sick; to left and right
The cowering houses shrink from sight,
Huddling and hopeless, eyeless, bare.

Misnamed, you say. For surely rare
Must be the angel shapes that light
In Angel Court!

Nay; the Eternities are there.
Death by the doorway stands to smite;
Life in its garrets leaps to light:
And Love has climbed that crumbling stair
In Angel Court!

It is the Bethlehem idyl in modern dress. God won't go away. Shut Him out of doors and He will lodge in your stable, sleep in your manger. In poverty if not in riches, in sorrow if gladness denies Him, come He will. On those Christmas nights long ago we needed not to be told that God was on the earth—was our side the threshold. We felt, as we glanced at the children's faces which the glancing flames alone lit up, that we were all together then at the feet of the Eternities of Life and Love, and that the other Eternity, Death, was only dark because its glory was on the other side. And, dear friend, ever since you have been the other side of the world I have been better able to realise that. Circle after circle of beloved faces and voices, like what once were rings of life in a growing tree, have vanished in the glow and the mystery; but it is only a dissolution out of firelight into sunlight. From the sunshine they came; into the sunshine they go. And you have gone from our winter firelight into the summer sunlight of the Other Side. It is always so, and only so. The light of life is Eternal in this kind or in that. Our life—first here, then there—is only alternation between winter firelight this side the world and summer sunlight that side; between the homely glow of this cheery indoor season now, and the great glow of the heavenly out-of-doors. By-and-bye we shall all be out-of-doors, and shall keep, like you, Christmas in the sunshine. To-day at our own hearth. In love, farewell!

ORPHEUS AND EURYDICE.

BY THE REV. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

"No man looking back is fit for the kingdom of God.—Luke ix. 62.

AMONGST the many beautiful tales of mythology few are more beautiful or more full of suggestiveness than the tale of Orpheus and Eurydice. It is a tale that has some special fitness in being told on Christmas Day, and if not told as of old it might often have been told around the blazing yule-log, at least it is not inappropriate within walls decorated with the symbolism of love and hope and faith, the symbolism of a religion that came not to rob the heathen yule-log of its joy, its warmth, its light, but only to add a deeper joy, a more heartfelt warmth, and a sweeter light.

Some few years ago most of us will remember to have read an account in the papers of the strange and sad wreck of a fine ship called the Eurydice. There was something phantom-like in its sudden disappearance. It was clearly seen from the land, and with all sails set that gleamed in the bright sunshine, like the wings of the sea-gull, the stately ship was making joyfully for the haven where she would be. In a moment, within sight of those to whom she seemed "like an unbodied joy," she disappeared, like a phantom ship, and left not a trace behind. A sailor with pardonable leanings towards an amiable and pardonable kind of superstition might have been led to ask the meaning or the story attached to the name Eurydice, and when told he would, no doubt, sailor-like, have thought that it was an ominously unfortunate, ill-fated name to have given the fair ship.

The story has been a favourite subject of art, and few of us but must have seen Burne-Jones's strikingly lovely picture of the chief incident in the story, the sudden disappearance of Eury-dice into the Under-world, at the very moment when she seemed to have reached the upper world, and was being given back from the dead to the love of her husband. I will give the story briefly (it it much the same everywhere) much as it is given in a book from which the poet John Keats delighted to dig his gold nuggets of ancient story, and which he knew so well how to mint into current coin of the Realm of Poetry. A word of comment here and there will suffice to unfold its suggestiveness. Orpheus is fabled to have been the son of Apollo, the god of the Sun—that is, human light or wisdom was derived from the heavenly light or wisdom. He received a lyre from Apollo, for is not Wisdom the bringer of Harmony? He played upon it with such a masterly hand that even the most rapid rivers ceased to overflow, the savage beasts of the forest forgot their wildness, and the mountains moved to listen to his song. All Nature seemed charmed and animated. Eurydice, meaning, doubtless, joy or happiness, was the only one who made a deep and lasting impression upon the melodious musician, and their nuptials were celebrated—Righteousness and Peace kissed each other. Their happiness, however, was short. Eurydice, stung in the foot by a serpent that was lurking in the grass, died of the poisoned wound. Her loss was so severely felt by Orpheus that he resolved to recover her or perish in the attempt. With his lyre in his hand he entered the Under-world, and gained an easy admission to the palace of Pluto. The King was charmed with the melody of his strains, and, according to the beautiful expressions of the poets, the torments of the wicked were suspended, the wheel of Ixion stopped, the stone of Sisyphus stood still, Tantalus forgot his perpetual thirst, and the Furies relented. Pluto and Proserpina were moved with his sorrow, and consented to restore to him Eurydice, provided he forebore looking behind till he had come to the extremest border of the Under-world. The conditions were gladly accepted, and Orpheus was already in sight of the upper regions of the air when he forgot his promise, and turned back to look at his long-lost Eurydice. He saw her, but she vanished instantly from his eyes. He attempted to follow her, but he was refused admission. He then totally separated himself from the society of mankind. The Thracian women, the story concludes, during one of their celebrations of the orgies of Bacchus, attacked him and tore him to pieces, throwing into the river Hebrus his head, which still articulated the words "Eurydice! Eurydice!" as it was carried down the stream into the Aegean Sea.

In broad lines this story is really a parable of the harmouy, order, and peace that even human wisdom is able to bring into the affairs of men. And it seems to carry us back in the first part, referring to the period of true but short happiness, to the Golden Age, when Wisdom had brought perfect order and harmony, and with it happiness. The seemingly miraculous sway that the music of Orpheus had upon men, and trees, and rivers, and stones is surely a not unnatural parable of the kind of sway wisdom has in bringing about a state of concord in the minds of men, by making them love virtue and equity, by drawing multitudes of people to a society, by making them subject to laws, obedient to government, forgetful of their unbridled affections, by making them learn the arts of peace, so that even stones and trees may well be considered as coming at the bidding and under the charm of the lyre of Orpheus, for were they not shaped into buildings and towns, and did not fields and orchards become planted with trees under the sway of the harmony of wisdom? Did not the same wisdom restrain the damaging power of swift rivers and tame the beasts of the field? What could exceed the aptness and beauty of Coleridge's description of a beautiful building such as a cathedral, for example, when he speaks of it as "frozen music," as if the very stones were spell-bound by some controlling music. But a time came when this happy result was brought to an end; some serpent of evil entered into the scheme of things, and human wisdom had to grapple with a more difficult problem and endeavour to overcome the evil influence at its source, and strive with even greater power to recall the lost happiness, the poisoned and dead Eurydice.

There the parable has a touch of the spiritual and the divine in it. Pluto and Proserpina are touched by man's yearning for lost happiness, and they consent to restore it under a condition which seems light enough at first to fulfil. It was man's first divine lesson, but it is the last he succeeds in learning and grasping. Happiness shall follow him, they say, if he will not look for it. They consented, says the story, provided Orpheus forebore looking back till he had reached the extremest bounds of his upward journey. No man looking back is fit for the Kingdom of God—that is the Christian version of the story. It is the strange but eternal law of the spiritual world that no man ever should find happiness by seeking for it. If he but goes forward in pure faith, in obedience to divine command to fulfil the journey through difficult climbing, in darkness and gloom, and even with seasons of misgivings in his heart, then will his happiness have really been accompanying him though not visible, and finally it will be seen and understood in its perfected fulness, when the divine condition was fulfilled, for we must walk by faith and not by sight through this probationary period. Well, the condition was violated. Man sought happiness and lost it; man doubted and saw even the happiness that had been silently accompanying him vanish. How spiritually true all this is! Then the story indicates that true happiness was lost for good, and that moroseness, passion and strife, and Bacchic pleasure took its place: the licence and cruelty and disorder of the Saturnalia followed the peace of the Orphic music.

We are told that the Christmas festival took the place of the Saturnalia among the Roman converts, as it took the place of the yule-tide festival of the Saxon races. Once again the lost happiness and lost peace was promised to be restored to men, and where human wisdom, trusting to itself, had failed, divine wisdom, which now meant a loving spirit, the greatest harmonising force, was succeeding, and had set forth on its conquering errand. The difference of the two kinds of harmonising forces is best seen, perhaps, in the beautiful symbolism with which men surrounded the story of the defeated Orphic music—defeated human wisdom, and the conquering Song of the Herald Angels—the conquering divine wisdom. A lovely story tells us why the nightingales sang with greater melody than all other birds; it was because they built their nests near the tomb of Orpheus.

A still lovelier story in the Gospel of Luke tells us that neither birds nor human voices sufficed to herald the happiness and peace that was to be divinely restored to men, but that with the angel heralding the good tidings of great joy, suddenly there were a multitude of the heavenly host praising God and saying, "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, goodwill toward men." Thus did men symbolise the entrance into the life of men of the new wisdom, the wisdom from above, which is a loving spirit, and marvellously indeed has it drawn men to it spell-bound, to achieve deeds of daring and of self-sacrifice and martyrdom; it has transformed and is transforming society into higher and higher forms of harmony; it has drawn the trees and mountains as never before, for wood and stone have crowded themselves into magnificent harmony, and risen into such structures of loveliness as are a joy for ever, and ever as the Christmas season comes round with its echo of the angels' song on our lips and in our hearts, the bonds of peace are rendered firmer and the fellowship of men is made ever a little closer, a little purer, a little kinder. At times, perhaps, we doubt whether all the great promise of Christianity is being fulfilled, whether all its promised peace and happiness is following after us; at times we have misgivings whether goodness and mercy will surely follow us all the days of our life, as we see much apathy and coldness, and perceive much forgetfulness of gratitude. We fain would look behind, we fain would look back, and, as it were, hasten the coming joy and peace and happiness. Like Orpheus, after toiling long along the arduous upward, onward, forward way, we are apt to grow a little doubting, a little impatient, and would fain be sure, would fain seize the fruit before it was promised to us. If the ancient tale of the ill-fated Orpheus and Eurydice has not its warning and constraining lesson for us, surely the words of him who knew the path of peace, and trod it to its extremest bounds, and became the Prince of Peace, will sink into our hearts, and as we heed them will make us fit to enter into his joy and his peace, and as we spread that joy and peace, will make us help him to establish the Kingdom of God on earth—and that story may at least in its humble way help to fix in our hearts the great words of Christ, "No man looking back is fit for the kingdom of God."

A CHRISTMAS PRAYER.

O FOUNT of Love by which we live,
This timely benediction give—
That all who ever loved before
May honour Love by loving more.

Bring ancient kindness back again,
And pity for the heart in pain,
And skill to harmonise the strife
That mars the music of our life.

And if there be a heart so cold
As never to have loved of old,
O tender Spirit, Love divine,
Touch that poor heart and make it Thine.

And still, we pray, this blessing give
While here we love, while here we live,
That we may bless the world for Thee
And learn to love eternally.

W. G. TARRANT.

SIR EDWARD BURNE-JONES.

III.

"LOVE among the Ruins" is considered by many to be one of the most beautiful and perfect of Burne-Jones's works. As a harmony of colouring alone, it is wonderful. Blues and greys are mingled with gleams of light and shadows of gloom. The thought of the picture is splendidly emphasised by this beauty of painting. The scene is a corner of a ruined temple; arches, columns, and carved friezes are seen covered with the entangling branches of a briar rose, and in the midst of the crumbling mass of masonry two lovers sit embracing each other. The building was once the scene of joy and worship, and the stone stairs, now thickly grown with grass weeds and wild flowers, were once trodden by the feet of earnest worshippers. The girl is sorrow-stricken with the thought of decay, ruin, and desolation which seem to overshadow her. She clings to the neck of her lover for protection, as though anticipating that a worse fate is to happen yet. The lover looks upon her sweet face reassuringly, and puts his strong arms about her shoulders. The thought of the picture is very clear. Love lives amidst all kinds of decay, for it is eternal. The ruined temple is indicative of the ancient systems which have, in different ages, been used to symbolise the various forms of this Love. The symbols have decayed, as progress has shown the people better ones; but the reality lasts, for it is eternal.

Another great favourite is "Le Chant d'Amour." Many popular painters have painted this subject; but few, I think, have touched it so deeply. It is somewhat easy to imagine a sentimental scene in which music awakens love, and call it "Harmony." Many have so painted, and the result has been trivial and superficial. But superficial is the last word that can be thought of in looking at this chant of Love by Burne-Jones. A bright gleam of sunlight is streaming through the chancel windows of a cathedral, lighting up a group in the foreground, which forms the subject of the picture. The group consists of three figures. One plays upon a kind of organ which was a great favourite with the Italian Pre Raphaelites; another listens, and the third is blowing the bellows. It is Love who works the bellows for the beautiful girl who is fascinating the knight in armour with her playing. There is not much else in the picture; and as you look at it you feel the painter possessed a power which cannot be described. You are sure this chant of love is not the same as that which is indicated in the ordinary modern love-scene where self-gratification is the aim. There is here genuine spiritual delight, and a love, which, as compared with the ordinary love-scene, is a new revelation. If you look attentively at the beautiful, if pensive, expression of the knight, in whose heart love has just arisen, you will notice the difference between it and the sickly, selfish, sentimentality on the faces of most men portrayed as being in love. The lover is solemnised by the fact of his love. He has not only had the sacred flame kindled; it has been kindled in such a way that it will grow everlastingly. It is heavenly love, not earthly passion—two utterly different emotions, though often called by the same name. The feeling which desires an object, however beautiful and noble, for itself is not love. It is only love when it is inspired by unselfishness and touched by the finger of God.

Many of the artist's works were painted in sets. "St. George and the Dragon," "The Seasons," "The Story of Perseus," "The Briar Rose," "The Six Days of Creation," and "Pygmalion and Galatea," consist each of several pictures, worked out with marvellous accuracy of detail in colour, drawing and design. Each set has become deservedly popular; but perhaps the best known is that of "The Briar Rose." The old story is one in which we can imagine a painter like Burne-Jones revelling. The pictures all show that he has taken delight in his work. First we are shown the tangled thicket of the briar-wood, which has been gradually growing around the palace in the hundred years during which its inmates have been sleeping. The brave knight is there with drawn sword, making his way to the palace gates to arouse the sleeping Court. He is alarmed at the greatness of his task, but he pushes on to rescue the Sleeping Beauty, and will risk all for love's sake. The second picture is a representation of the interior of the enchanted palace. The king sleeps in the council room, with his councillors and courtiers around him, also asleep. The third is a very beautiful grouping of maiden forms on the garden terrace, where they have fallen asleep in the midst of their work. But the great picture of the series is the last, though it is not the most popular. It is the rose-bower where the sleeping princess awaits the knight's awakening. The picture cannot easily be forgotten. The lines of the sleeping beauty are very straight, resembling the effigies of a Gothic tomb. The figure is sweet and child-like, with its gracefully resting arms, and its fair hair falling gently upon the fairer neck. So beautiful a figure should not have been asleep so long. The world needs the beautiful, the sweet, and the spiritual awake and about, that those who live in the ordinary humdrum walks of life may be cheered; and those who can, by struggling and fighting, arouse such angelic spirits to waking, active life, are our true heroes, our valiant knights. It is only a fairy story; but how true! The majority of those around us are enchanted by the things of time and sense. They are asleep to the best concerns of their being, and need rousing. The true knights are those who are ready with the sword of the spirit to enter the enchanted ground in spite of the difficulties, and who are willing to be torn by the thorns that encumber the way.

There is a great charm about the four pictures which received their inspiration from William Morris's Poem, "The Earthly Paradise." Pygmalion and Galatea is a story well known, and lends itself very easily to the popular artist in search of an idea. But it requires an artist of very lofty genius to deal with the subject as Burne-Jones has dealt with it. The titles alone are inspirations—"The Heart Desires," "The Hand Refrains," "The Goddess Fires," and "The Heart Attains." The treatment reminds one very emphatically of Browning's "Paracelsus." Paracelsus works in his natural groove, and his work is admired and praised by men. But he himself is not satisfied. He turns from his work, and in a time of resting he meditates, and is fired with a higher and nobler inspiration. He has merged the desire to know with the desire to love, and finally arrived at his ideal, recognising the great unity and the divinity of all work and nature. Pygmalion's work is different to that of Paracelsus. But men look upon his beautiful sculptures and admire them. He admires also the work of his hand. One statue has pleased him more than all the rest. It is a beautiful work of art, and he loves his own creation. But it is scarcely fit for a man to love, being only marble. It does not live. He stops chipping, pauses and thinks; his love increases and he worships. He prays the gods that they will bestow life upon his beautiful work. Then, in the third picture, we see the goddess Venus alighting from heaven in a blue cloud, with flowers falling and doves flying about her. She gives the lovely carved figure a touch of life, and Pygmalion sees his creation glowing with the soft flush of pink as the life blood permeats the body of marble. The last of the series shows Pygmalion kneeling before his own figure, now breathing with warm life, and he bows in adoration. His soul has attained, because his work is more than art now; it has had life and love given to it.

We are all workers; the marble different in each case. Shall it be a lifeless bit of stone, or shall it be touched with the divine hand, and so made to vibrate and glow with the blood of life? The only thing that will make life worth living is that our work should be sacred for us, the one object of our life; and to be sacred it must be fused with love.

One other picture I must speak of in conclusion. It is "The Mirror of Venus." Put this by the side of "The Golden Stair," and, I think, in the two you have a collection of beauty which cannot be equalled in all the realm of art. The "Mirror of Venus" was begun many years ago, somewhere near 1867. It represents a group of nine maidens gathered round a small clear lake in a beautifully verdant valley. The sky is blue above, and its reflection is seen distinct in the pool into which the maidens gaze. The lovely figures are standing, kneeling, and gracefully bending, looking at the reflection of their own loveliness in Nature's mirror. Venus stands erect, the tallest and fairest of them all. The girls and flowers and hills and shadows are all works of beauty; and words fail to say more. You must see the picture to realise its loveliness. Both the picture and its subject warn against any attempt at words of description. Venus and her companions have come from Arcady, or some other pure sphere known only in our dreams. They do not seem to be of us, though for a time they have taken our bodily form to beautify it. Nature may catch the image and send it back; but even Nature cannot retain it. Those maidens came, like those who entered our house down the golden stair, from a spiritual sphere; and they must go, for we are too materialistic for them to stay. They looked into earth's mirror and for a moment it caught their beauty and grace. But when they depart, even their image will depart also. They vanish before we even try to retain them. But it is good to think that they do at times come to grace our existence by their presence. It is good for us to drink in their pure beauty while we can, so that their influence and spirit may beautify our lives.

Such painters as Burne-Jones help us to see these spirits. We miss much of them in the ordinary grind of every-day life. Artists point them out to us, and we ourselves must make earnest quest for them. We miss life's truest reality when we miss them. They are not seen by the eye of sense; it is the eye of the spirit which alone discerns them. Such visions are of the highest realm of reality, and such therefore must we seek after.

A SEASONABLE LETTER FROM EVERYWHERE.

DEAR INQUIRER,—Your rule in these later years of your most honourable history is that everyone who writes to you shall sign his or her name—not necessarily as a sign of good faith, says one of my friends, but (apparently) to gratify the insatiable curiosity of the modern reader. The ancient reader took it for granted that anonymity was modesty, and it certainly afforded a pleasing exercise in the art of identifying authors by their style. But doubtless your rule is excellent. Another of my friends, indeed, declares that it is a measure of self-protection on your part, and that you find therein a defence against bores and libellers. But who can be protected against such people? Certainly not you, my dear INQUIRER. Like those to whom the Apostle wrote, you are called upon by fate to "suffer fools"—"gladly," I would fain add, but "grimly" is, perhaps, more like the word. Well, I do not dispute your ruling; I will duly sign my little contribution to your Christmas number; and by all that is free and catholic I trust you will not rule me out.*

The fact is, I wish to thank you most sincerely for a great many things; and I wish to grumble at—nothing. That will surprise you, I am sure. As long as I remember you, which is a very long while, Someone—a rather quick-tempered fellow as he himself must confess—has, now and then, grumbled at one thing or other. The paper has been too light, or too heavy, for him—too serious, too flippant; too learned, too shallow; too denominational, too undenominational; too political, too non-political; in short too-everything in particular that he dislikes. And yet, such is the fascination you exert upon him, that he goes on submitting himself to fresh irritation, week by week, snatching a fearful joy out of each new enormity of yours.

Now, I dare not presume to advise you at all; but if I were Editor (and it is generally admitted that I should succeed better in that capacity than any previous occupant of the chair)—I say, if I were Editor, I should be strongly tempted, not to say disposed, to take a certain innocently malicious pleasure in teasing that dear delightful "stupid," and just be too-anything that I thought would stir him up. It would be good for him, in the end, though he might not know it at the time.

Why, Sir, I gratefully acknowledge that it has been most healthful for me to be stirred up, now and again. I have gone on "taking my ease in Zion" (please understand this as highly metaphorical, both as to place and mood), till, unless you rouse me, I must droop off into mere sleep—which, according to "In Memoriam," is "Death's twin-brother." My ambition has long been to see how I look when asleep. Hitherto it has been denied me; but so far as I have observed in the case of my close acquaintance, Everyone-else, the slumbrous state of a religious man too nearly resembles that of Sleep's "twin-brother" to be pleasant. I thank you, therefore, for an occasional stirring-up. Keep on stirring, I beg, either with the Editor's own broad and gentle pen, or with the finer, maybe, but scratchier nib of some one of his young men. Remember that admirable and evergreen story of the Man and the Ass. Ride on in your own way, Sir; and if Someone, standing by, shouts in anger or derision, be sure Everyone will not do so.

As to those of your features that most appeal to my taste, I may say that I like the ——* columns best; the articles signed by the well-known initials ——* and ——, and especially ——, delight me always. I don't care so much for the allusions to ——* or for the leaders and notes dealing with ——, but that good fellow, Everyone-else, does; so I am neighbourly content. But if you saw the eagerness with which, on Friday evening or Saturday morning, I seized the paper knife and turn to the —— paragraphs, you would be more than content. Why not increase that class of matter? But, there! I said I wouldn't grumble; please take that last observation as the not unwilling singer receives the sweet flattery of an encore. If your programme cannot permit of the additions I should like to see, I loyally bow to your decision, and only prize the more what I do get.

That is all the business of my letter, the rest is unadulterated pleasure. It is to ask your acceptance of my very best wishes. Your little den—I mean your editorial sanctum at the basement of Essex Hall—is neither open to me, nor to my friend Everyone-else. But, proper as that is, you cannot, and I am sure you would not block the letter-box against people like myself, who lacking the literary art, still enjoy it in others, and who take advantage of this heart-opening season to tell their benefactors something of their gratitude. In your hours of toil for my good, you have but few revelations (I fear) of what I really feel towards you. Be assured, then, at the present time, that I feel myself greatly your debtor; that I am trying to grow in grace, and to put up with any slight defects that I may occasionally suspect in you (for, to judge absolutely, I am hardly fitted); and that my gratitude for benefits past is transformed, even while I write, into a lively sense of still greater favours to come.

So wishing you, my dear INQUIRER, as well as the Editor and his young men, long life and increasing prosperity,—I am, yours respectfully,

EVERYONE.

WE must send truth abroad, not forcing it on here and there a mind, not watching its progress anxiously, but trusting that it will light on a kindly soil, and yield its fruit. So Nature teaches.—Dr. Channing.

BREAMY.

WE called him Breamy, a name which exactly hit off the kind of impeded gush that characterised his attempts at conversation. He was a queer-looking little fellow, clad in the quaintest of possible garbs. A long coat whose tails almost swept the ground, reminded one of the Artful Dodger, the sleeves being rolled up sufficiently to show two rather grimy hands, that is, when Breamy could deny himself the pleasure of jingling the coppers in his trousers pockets; for he was always making money—honestly when it suited him, and otherwise when the opportunity offered.

Here and there in his costume were undesigned slits and rents, some of which served as impromptu pockets, others lent themselves to a very necessary scheme of ventilation, for Breamy was not a pattern of cleanliness. Now and then he delighted to soak himself in the hot steaming waters of the canal; at other times he contented himself with the mere reminiscence of former washings. Occasionally his mother would put through the dolly-tub the faded calico shirt that protected his inner man, Breamy meanwhile staying in bed until operations were completed. Then, despite the boisterous inclemency of the weather, he would sally forth in his shirt-sleeves, and to all his friends and acquaintances who failed to notice the temporary improvement he would point out the change.

"Oh, Mr. Smith—clean shirt—mother washed it." And then after bulging out the sleeves to their full dimensions, he would stalk solemnly round, so that we might have every opportunity of admiring his diminished attire.

He had a curious wistful face, older than his years, and already marked with the signs of hardship and cruelty. Sometimes one would catch a look in the eyes that dimly shadowed forth the unconscious yearning of the soul within; but generally one was met by the keen questioning glance of the boy who, long before the rightful time, has to fight his way in the world, not only providing for his own needs, but also ministering to the unholy wants of drunken, improvident parents.

Occasionally one would meet Breamy in unaccustomed places. Passing one night by a corner where stood several boys selling the evening papers, I felt a tug at the cape of my overcoat, and turning round I saw a little squat figure holding on to my garment. "Eh! don'ch yer know me? I'm Breamy."

The words tumbled out with a funny kind of gurgle that made it difficult to understand what was said. By the flare of the public-house lamp, I could make out the gloriously dirty face of my little friend. He had taken to newspaper selling, and was doing rather well. Perhaps he was not as scrupulously honest as he ought to be. He told me with triumph in his voice how he had "chiselled" somebody out of twopence, and when I pointed out the questionable aspect of the transaction, he simply shrugged his shoulders and said, "What's better?"

And yet we noticed moral advances, which fostered our hopes of the lad. He no longer went on the "prigging" lay—he forbore even from "sneaking turmits" from the greengrocer's shop, and in other respects he showed a better spirit; but it was a long time before we could convince him that "chiselling" was wrong. He looked on bargaining as a fair field for the display of cunning; if he could get the better of his partner, by any means whatever, he regarded himself as a more worthy member of society, and he would walk round in high glee as he told us of his successful performances. He would generally turn in on Sunday afternoon to the little meeting we held in a room rented from one of the people of the district, and on such occasions it was a treat to hear him sing, especially if the chorus of the hymn was a rousing one. He would throw himself bodily at the tune and lift on high his husky treble with all the soul and fervour of a philharmonic artiste.

Since I have left the district I have often wondered what has become of the lad. He had in him the makings of a good strong man. We watched the lad's nature in its silent progress towards good, and if sometimes we doubted, it was not for long; some new feature of gentleness or honesty would come to cheer our hopes and re-establish us in our work. Breamy is of a class not often touched by our churches; even our Domestic Missions but rarely have the opportunity of moulding the character of such a one, and yet the work lies close at our hand in all the larger cities of our land. In the work of redeeming the fallen, it is the living influence of personality that tells. The touch of a brotherly hand, and the sympathetic glance that speaks of the love within, do more for the salvation of souls than all the merely official attempts to save the people according to theory. Breamy is our brother, but he is generally shy at claiming such relation; it is for us to greet him in Christlike fashion, and in the spirit of the Master do what we can to help him in his fight with want and disease, sin and death.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Christmas Appeals.

Bermondsey.—May I beg a little help towards a Christmas treat for the Sunday scholars here? Readers will remember that they have no minister of their own as yet—I hope they soon may have—to plead for them. The superintendent and teachers who so patiently and loyally persevere in the good work deserve well of other kind hearts.—W. G. Tarrant, 4, Geraldine-road, Wandsworth, S.W.

London: George's-row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers gratefully acknowledges 2s. 6d. from "F."

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—A grand series of concerts and musical services, by the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir, conducted by Mme. Clara Novello Davies, was held on the four days, Friday, Nov. 29, to Monday, Dec. 2, arranged by the Rev. W. J. Davies and the Mountpottinger congregation. The large hall of the Y.M.C.A., in Wellington-place, was secured for the concerts, and the Rosemary-street Chapel and All Souls' Church were lent for musical services on the Sunday afternoon, when the Rev. W. J. Davies officiated at Rosemary-street, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond at All Souls'. In the evening the choir sung at Mountpottinger and All Souls'. The hall and the churches were filled to their utmost capacity, and it was computed that 7,000 people must have attended the various concerts and services. The choir is acknowledged to be the finest ladies' choir in the world, and their part singing made a deep impression. The financial result is not yet known, but it is expected to be very satisfactory. From a musical point of view the visit was a brilliant success.

Kendal.—On Monday week the Rev. H. V Mills delivered a lecture in the Market Place Chapel on "The Price of War: Is it the Only Way?" Mr. Councillor Jefferys, a member of the Society of Friends, took the chair, and in an opening address explained the position of his Society on the subject. Mr. Mills, in his lecture, forcibly illustrated the ruinous cost of the present war, not merely in the millions it has cost, but in men, and waste of energy that might have been expended on productive and beneficent work. He pleaded strongly for arbitration as the true method for settling international disputes. At the close of the lecture a number of pictures were shown on the screen, illustrating the war and the teachings of Christ. A hymn was sung during the collection, and the meeting closed with prayer.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—A Sale of Work, promoted by the Ladies' Sewing Society, to assist the current expenses of the church, was held in the schoolroom on Thursday and Friday, the 12th and 13th inst. Miss A. E. Clephan kindly opened the sale, which, notwithstanding the most unpropitious weather, resulted in net receipts of £67, being a little more than the amount required. A very satisfactory result considering the number of calls recently made on the members and friends of the congregation in connection with the building fund.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held on Saturday evening, the 14th inst., in the Hope-street Church Hall, when between sixty and seventy teachers connected with the different Sunday-schools assembled, to meet the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. Tea and social intercourse occupied the first part of the evening, after which the President (Rev. J. Crowther Hirst) took the chair and introduced Mr. Carpenter, who gave an interesting address on "Doctrinal Teaching in our Sunday Schools." He spoke of the necessity for definite religious instruction, without which the children were sure to grow up with vague and uncertain ideas, and pointed out that there must be in the teacher's own mind some wrong theological idea to combat, whether Agnostic or Atheistic, and he urged that the teaching should be doctrinal and constructive rather than controversial. The Rev. E. W. Lummis proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Carpenter for his valuable address, and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in seconding the resolution, pointed out that in Liverpool it was Orthodoxy rather than Agnosticism that the teachers had to combat, as so many of the children attended church schools during the week. The President, after putting the resolution to the meeting, said that although it was a good thing to give doctrinal teaching, he did not consider that it was of the first importance, and he would like those teachers who were not able to study the subject sufficiently, and who had not much time to give for the preparation of their lessons, to feel that the forming of character was the most important thing, and that no good and really earnest teacher need feel that his or her work was done in vain.

London: Sydenham.—Conferences took place on Sunday last at No. 1, Meadowcroft (near Bell Green), Sydenham, in the interest of a new Unitarian movement; twelve adults were present. It was decided to hold services each Sunday at 6.45 P.M. in the Meadowcroft Hall. Mr. Abbott convened the meetings, and the Rev. W. Birks was in the chair. The gatherings were most interesting, and it is to be hoped they will lead to the successful establishment of regular Unitarian services.

Moreton Hampstead (Re-opening Services).—The nearly century-old Cross Chapel was re-opened on Sunday, the 15th inst., after having been closed for five weeks for renovation, during which time the services were held in the old General Baptist Chapel. The renovations include a new floor and a heating apparatus, while the old square pews have been replaced by modern benches. The congregation owe the whole of these improvements to the generosity of Mr. T. B. Bowring, of London, whose family was for generations connected with the old chapel, before his father, the late Edward Bowring, removed to London thirty-five years ago. The opening services were to have been conducted on the 8th inst. by the Rev. H. S. Solly, but he was kept at home by illness, and the services on the 15th were taken by the Rev. A. Lancaster, minister of the chapel, who preached in the morning on "Christian Life the Hope of the Future," and in the afternoon on "The Unity of all Religions." Special anthems and introits were rendered by the choir.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The biennial bazaar in aid of the funds of the Church of the Divine Unity was held in the schoolrooms on Wednesday and Thursday, Dec. 4 and 5. The proceedings were opened by the Sheriff of Newcastle-on-Tyne, who expressed his pleasure in being able to support a church that had done so much good for the city. At the close of the bazaar it was announced that the proceeds amounted to the substantial sum of upwards of £250.

Nottingham.—On Monday evening, Dec. 9, a lecture was delivered in connection with the High Pavement Historical Society, by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., entitled "The English Presbyterian in the Eighteenth Century." The chair was taken by the President (Mr. J. C. Warren), who, in the course of a brief introduction, traced the early history of the Presbyterian movement in Nottingham, and pointed out that the High Pavement congregation could claim to be the direct descendants of English Presbyterians of the Commonwealth. Professor Odgers said that the original intention of Presbyterians was not to sever themselves from connection with the National Church, whose existence they thoroughly supported in theory, regarding the Independents, or Separatists, as schismatics. Rather was it their hope and intention to realise the idea, supported by the Broad Churchmen of to-day, that if the Church of England were to be reformed it must be from within. Their separation from the Established Church was due to a regrettable spasm of vindictive legislation, which disappointed Presbyterians in a deeply cherished hope, and caused many to become Nonconformists who would not otherwise have separated themselves from the Church of England. Professor Odgers proceeded to relate the history of the amalgamation of the Presbyterians and Independents under the title of Protestant Dissenters, according to the "Articles of Conciliation," drawn up mainly under the supervision of John Howe in 1691. Differences in matters of theological feeling and methods of Church work caused this amalgamation to be short-lived, and Presbyterians resumed something like their former position. Mr. Odgers then referred at some length to the theological position of the Presbyterian ministers and laity of the eighteenth century, and spoke in detail of the culture and learning that marked so many of them. He also made allusion to some of the Dissenting academics, dealing particularly with that of Dr. Doddridge. At the close Mr. Odgers was heartily thanked for his lecture, on the motion of the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Grant, M.A., minister of St. Andrew's Scottish Presbyterian Church in Nottingham. Among other guests present was also the Rev. Dr. Forbes (minister of the Second Presbyterian Congregation in Nottingham).

Sheffield: Upperthorpe (Resignation).—The Rev. John Ellis, having accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation to succeed the Rev. W. G. Cadman at Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, E., has tendered his resignation of the pastorate of Upperthorpe Chapel, which will take effect at the end of March next.

Todmorden.—A highly successful bazaar was held in the Unitarian School on Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Monday, Dec. 5, 6, 7, and 9, to raise £500 to pay a debt on the Fielden Memorial Extension and to decorate and furnish. Mr. E. B. Fielden, M.P., opened on the first day, the Mayor, Alderman W. Ormerod, being in the chair. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, a friend of fifty years' standing, opened on the second day, the Rev. Arthur W. Fox, M.A., being in the chair. Councillor James Dugdale opened on the third day, Mr. W. H. Sutcliffe, of Chorley, being in the chair. The stalls represented the four seasons, and were charmingly decorated. Many excellent entertainments were given. The total receipts of the bazaar, after expenses had been paid, were £530.

Walmsley.—Last Saturday, in connection with the Sunday-school, the young men's annual tea-party and entertainment took place. There was a large attendance, and a good tea was provided, and served entirely by the young men themselves. The first part of the entertainment consisted of songs and choruses and a piano solo, followed by a lively farce, which kept the audience in almost continuous merriment.

CHILDREN'S COUNTRY HOLIDAY FUND.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mr. Ion Pritchard, £2 2s.; Mrs. Bartram, 10s.; Mr. E. G. Mott, £1 1s.; Dr. Courtney Kenny, £1 1s.; Miss R. Saint, 5s.; Mr. Howard Young, £1.

Cadbury's COCOA

Free from Alkali, Kola, Malt, Hops, or any admixture.
It is Cocoa and the Best Cocoa only.

What CADBURY's Cocoa is:

The great Scientist, Baron von Liebig, says:

"COCOA is a perfect food, as wholesome as delicious, a beneficent restorer of exhausted power; but its quality must be good, and it must be carefully prepared. It is highly nourishing and easily digested, and it is fitted to repair wasted strength and preserve health. It agrees with those whose occupations oblige them to undergo severe mental strains; with public speakers, and with all those who give to work a portion of the time needed for sleep."

CAUTION: How to test the Purity of Cocoas. If treated with alkali and chemicals, such cocoas will have a medicinal scent when the tin is opened, and will be a darker colour when in liquor. CADBURY's Cocoa has no addition of any kind, and is guaranteed absolutely pure. Insist on having Cadbury's Sold in packets and tins only.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR silent greetings go out to many friends, near and distant, as we write this note on Christmas Eve. The year is quickly drawing to a close, the fourth year in which one who is conscious of many failings has held the difficult post of Editor of this Journal. It is a good time to ask forgiveness of some, to express heartfelt gratitude to very many, and most of all, perhaps, to those true friends, who, strongly dissenting from the course taken by THE INQUIRER in a very trying time, have yet had generous forbearance and an understanding sympathy. Next year THE INQUIRER will be 60 years old, and whoever on its birthday is at the helm, we are confident that our paper will be found "always young for Liberty."

MANY of our readers will be glad to hear that with the New Year the Rev. R. A. Armstrong will resume the publication of his "Sermons for the Day," a monthly issue of sermons, lectures, and addresses. The January number will contain a sermon on "Good Will and Peace," and in February the subject will be "The Historic Jesus; a Comment on the Article 'Gospels' in the 'Encyclopædia Biblica.'" The price of "Sermons for the Day," like the Rev. C. Hargrove's "Mill Hill Pulpit," will be 1d. monthly, or 1½d. by post, and the new series will be published by the Liverpool Booksellers' Co., 70, Lord-street, Liverpool.

"A NATURAL or a Miraculously Organised Jesus" is the title of a sermon preached last July in Christ Church, Yardley Wood, by the Vicar, the Rev. C. E. Beeby, B.D., and now reprinted from the Church of England Pulpit. (It may be had by post for 1½d. from the author, at Yardley Wood Vicarage, Warstock, Birmingham.) Taking for text Hebrews v. 7, 8, 9, (R.V.), Mr. Beeby insists on the reality of this conception of Christ, as veritably man, who "learned obedience by the things which he suffered," and, as the author of the Epistle says in another verse, was "in all points tempted like as we are." With this is contrasted the mischievous unreality of the theory which centres in the idea of a miraculous birth, giving a Christology which destroys the true springs of moral endeavour. "The Human Christ of the Epistle to the Hebrews," Mr. Beeby says, "is a Christ of the same flesh and blood as ourselves. No man is mere man. The Divine is in the human, and the human in the Divine. Every human life is embraced in the one Universal Eternal Life." We must learn to overcome through the power of the same Spirit by which Christ gained his victory.

For my own part I feel that the hopeful, encouraging, stimulating gospel is the gospel that the higher life comes to the asking, seeking, and knocking of the soul, and in response to the aspiration and upward striving of my nature. That my nature has the capacity, and that Christ has proved it, that is to me the good news. No doubt we are all dependent on the Uplifting Spirit, but the Spirit of God is not dependent on the form and formula of the priest. The same Eternal Spirit, through which Christ offered a perfect sacrifice on earth, pleasing and acceptable to God, is ready to flow into the souls of all, in response to the aspiration, the striving, the valiant effort of the man according to his natural origin and constitution, made as he is in the Divine image, and supported as he is, at every moment of his life, by the Divine embrace of the everlasting arms.

OUR report of the recent "Hungarian" Soirée at Essex Hall, no less than the letters we published at the time, bore witness to the extreme cordiality of the welcome extended to Miss Tagart's party of visitors to the Unitarian Churches of Transylvania, not only by their co-religionists, but by the Hungarian people generally. Another testimony to this cordiality of feeling has been received by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, in the following letter, from the Budapest branch of the Carpathian Club, which, it will be remembered, includes members of every religious denomination. The letter is signed by Mr. Daniel Gábor, President of the Budapest branch and Vice-President of the House of Commons of Hungary, and Mr. Jerémias Rersöy, Secretary of the Budapest branch and Redactor:—

"The Committee of the Budapest branch of the Carpathian Club of Transylvania wish to express their deep esteem and sympathy for the very kind way in which you, Mr. Shrubsole, and several of your friends whom we had the pleasure of seeing not long ago, inform your countrymen about our land and people, our history in the past, and our efforts in the present. May this union of true hearts and souls continue to keep the mutual interest alive for the benefit of both countries. We hope to meet and guide you again some day. Our Club is glad to assure you and your friends of the heartiest welcome at any time."

Mr. Shrubsole informs us that he has heard from several friends who are eager to join in another Hungarian tour next year.

FOR those of our friends who read Dutch we note that in the last three numbers of the Theologisch Tijdschrift, the numbers for July, September, and November, they will find a series of articles on "James Martineau," by Mr. W. van der Vlugt. The articles, which fill altogether eighty pages, are written with very warm appreciation of Dr. Martineau's teaching and reverence for his personality. After a sketch of our great Teacher's life, based largely upon THE INQUIRER'S Memorial number and other material published in these columns, Mr. van der Vlugt gives a full account of the four books on "Spinoza," the "Types of Ethical Theory," the "Study of Religion," and "The Seat of Authority in Religion," and in conclusion, quoting Dr. Drummond's word, in our Memorial number, that "merely to see and hear him was a pure delight," thankfully acknowledges the blessing which that long life shed upon his pupils, his church, and his people. "For the significance of our best men lies after all not so much in what they say and write and do, but above all in what they are."

AT the meeting of the Ministers Institute at Manchester College, Oxford, in the spring, as we recorded at the time, a valuable paper was read by Dr. Drummond on "The Use and Meaning of the phrase 'The Son of Man' in the Synoptic Gospels." This paper, fully elaborated, has since been published in the quarterly Journal of Theological Studies, and will be found in the April and July numbers.

MANY of our readers will be delighted to learn that Mr. Harry Rawson has given his consent to sit for his portrait at an early date. Our ministers, we doubt not, will be pleased to call attention to this opportunity of showing how widespread is the respect in which Mr. Rawson is held by Unitarians, not only in Lancashire, but all over the country; for no one has worked more loyally than he. Communications may be addressed to Mr. F. Monks, Walton Old Hall, near Warrington.

DR. CROSSKEY AND THE BIRMINGHAM UNIVERSITY.

HAMLET conceded the possibility that "a great man's memory may outlive his life half-a-year"; but "by'r lady," he added, "he must build churches, then." The times move on swiftly nowadays, and we are disinherited of our fathers' best legacies almost before their graves are green. Of one great man—in the opinion of some, one of the greatest that have sprung from our Free Churches—the memory ought to be secured, if by nothing else, by the part he took in the inception of the great Midland University.

That institution seemed a mere dream of enthusiasts an incredibly short time ago. It is not yet fifteen years since Dr. H. W. Crosskey, as president of the Birmingham Philosophical Society, made, as his presidential address, "A Plea for a Midland University." The address closed with these words:—

Perchance in years to come some diligent antiquary may unearth among rare and long-forgotten books the volume of the "Proceedings of the Birmingham Philosophical Society" containing this poor and inadequate address, and with him I patiently leave the decision whether those who venture to say to-day—speaking amid the smoking chimneys and blast furnaces of the Black Country—

"Another Athens shall arise,
And to remoter time
Bequeath, like sunset to the skies,
The splendour of its prime,"— are, or are not, the vain dreamers of empty dreams.

Whether a type of education worthy of the proud name of Athens will ultimately characterise the newest of our Universities history, indeed, must show; if such an ideal is to prevail over the specious allurements of a ready-money "utilitarianism," it must be through the force of such considerations as Dr. Crosskey put forth in what may truly be called, in this connection, an epoch-making utterance. It would be wrong to suggest that his was the first voice to plead with the thriving capital of the Midlands for due attention to the higher possibilities of intellectual culture in our age. But it is due to his sagacious and far-seeing mind to observe that this address was the first clear formulation of a scheme on the subject; and that it led the way to those organised efforts which were speedily crowned with success, though not so speedily as to anticipate his death. He died in faith, not having received the promises, in accordance with that blessed ordinance of Providence that links together all dreamers of great dreams, and all workers for good causes whose day is not yet.

Those who are interested in any way in this matter may consult the records of the Philosophical Society (Vol. V., part ii., p. 231); or they may luckily secure a copy of the reprinted address (Cornish, Birmingham, 1887). They will find in it many an echo of that lofty tone of thought which co-existed in Dr. Crosskey with a delightfully genial lowliness and quiet comradeship. Into his examination of the arguments concerning the merits and defects of the London University (as it then existed) we need not enter. He admits the use of a merely examining Board, but his plea is for a teaching institution in the best sense of the terms. He claims that no device for imparting knowledge, still less for merely testing it, can compare in worth with the means of educative intercourse which a real University life affords.

More noteworthy, not only by heads of institutions, but by parents and by aspiring youth, are Dr. Crosskey's warnings against confining instruction to the things which are considered to be most profitable in a commercial sense. His remarks on this head may be supposed to be specially needed in those great manufacturing centres, of which Birmingham is an example, where "practical" men abound and the pursuit of wealth is keen and incessant; but, if we mistake not, there is a disposition in circles remote from the dim atmosphere of mills and factories to yield to the same sordid seductions, and to forget that to live worthily and to the full of one's faculties is the very justification of "getting a living." "A University College," he says, "puts out of court the question, cui-bono? It is not afraid of attempting the solution of abstract problems." "The student who neglects every subject save the one which is to be the business of his life will not have the same mental grasp of its methods and resources as the student who has received a certain amount of general training. The intellectual powers need cultivation as intellectual powers before they are fit and ready to be used with the best effect for practical purposes."

It would take us too far to apply this principle to other things than the education of young people—to religious culture and to politics, for example. Verb. sap. Those who have watched the trend of public affairs since "theory" has had to give place to bustling opportunism may say whether the ends of utility itself have been served by the change. And if, as a body of religious people, we are to-day impatient of religious philosophy and rather insensible to the finer emotions, the question arises—have we become through the dismissal of "theory" any more upright than our fathers, more self-denying and benevolent? It would, however, be in every way inappropriate to break off upon a dubious note. We have gladly taken the opportunity of calling attention to one of the many good services rendered by our late friend to the cause of education and progress, and to sun ourselves awhile in pious memory of him.

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

Mr. G. H. CLENNELL, secretary of the Presbyterian Board, the headquarters of which are at Dr. Williams's Library, has sent us a copy of the revised prospectus of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, prepared to meet the requirements of the University of Wales, in the matter of theological degrees. Important changes have been made, and an additional professor has been appointed. As will be seen from the passages from the prospectus quoted below, valuable assistance is offered to students preparing for the B.D. degree, and Mr. Clennell points out that Carmarthen is the only one of the "recognised and approved" colleges which is free from sectarian tests. The new arrangements come into force next October, and we are glad to call attention to the following statements in the prospectus:—

This College is the continuation of the Academy founded by the Rev. Samuel Jones, M.A., sometime Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford, one of the Two Thousand ejected Ministers of 1662; and is supported and governed by the Presbyterian Board, London, which was founded in 1689. It is endowed in part by the Will of Dr. Daniel Williams (1644-1715), by the Jackson Trustees, and the Berman Trustees.

The College exists for the purpose of educating young men for the Christian ministry among Protestant Nonconformists. It is open to Students of all denominations without any profession of Theological opinion being required; and the various branches of study are taught without reference to any sectarian distinctions.

The course of study is mainly Theological, and under the present regulations extends over three Sessions, being adapted, in the higher departments, to the requirements for the B.D. degree of the University of Wales. Every Student on his entrance will be required to pledge himself to conform to the rules and regulations of the College, and to complete the prescribed course, unless special permission to withdraw at an earlier date be given by the Presbyterian Board.

Prizes of considerable amount are offered for competition at the close of every Session. Students who require pecuniary assistance are also eligible for Bursaries provided by Trustees of various Funds in England and Wales. Graduate-students preparing for the B.D. Examinations of the University of Wales are further eligible for scholarships of £40 per annum, tenable at the College for three years.

Graduate-students preparing for the B.D. Examinations of the University of Wales are admitted to the various courses free of charge. Other Students are required to pay a fee of £8 per Session, which must be forwarded to the Secretary of the Presbyterian Board not later than the last week in September.

Applications for admission must reach the Secretary of the Presbyterian Board on or before Sept. 1, and must be on the prescribed form, to be obtained of the Secretary.

Candidates who propose to follow the B.D. course must be graduates of a University or College by law established, in the United Kingdom, with power to grant Degrees in the ordinary Faculties.

The staff of the College is as follows:—Principal, Walter J. Evans, M.A. (Oxon.); Professor of Theology, the Rev. D. E. Jones, M.A. (Glasgow); Professor of Hebrew and Hellenistic Greek, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, B.A. (Oxon.); Professor of Philosophy, the Rev. E. Keri Evans, M.A. (Glasgow).

The full prospectus may be had by application to Mr. Clennell, at 87, Down-road, Clapton, N.E.

DR. WILLIAM SMYTH MEMORIAL FUND.—The Rev. C. J. Street acknowledges with thanks the following further gifts from readers of THE INQUIRER:—R. E. Haslam, £2 2s.; W. C. Jolly, £2 2s.; J. T. and H. Atkins, £1; Mrs. Nicholls, £1 1s.; William Harris, £1 1s.; W. H. Ryland, £1 1s.; Mrs. Günter, 10s.; Burnley Unitarian Church, per Rev. E. A. Voysey, £1 1s. He has also received £1 6s. 6d. from five friends to be added to the Bolton List. The total amount to date is £75 19s. 6d., which has been forwarded to the Treasurer of the Fund, who writes: "I can't tell you how grateful everybody here is to you and your Unitarian friends for the very active help you are giving us."

LITERATURE.

A FAITHFUL BISHOP.*

A PATHETIC interest attaches to this last book prepared for publication by the late Bishop of Durham. The Preface is dated Whitsuntide, and another page bears this inscription :—

I had purposed to dedicate this book to my wife, for forty-eight years my unfailing counsellor and stay: I now dedicate it to her memory.

Mrs. Westcott died in May, and in July, before the book was actually issued, her husband also passed away.

"Lessons from Work" is the title given to this collection of addresses on a great variety of subjects, showing the breadth of the Bishop's sympathies, and the earnestness with which he took up every subject, convinced that there was Divine significance in the whole of human life. Thus we find addresses not only on the central doctrines of the Church, and what might have been regarded as Dr. Westcott's special subject, Biblical Criticism, and the Revised Version, but on such subjects as "Prayer the Support of Foreign Missions," "The Prophetic Call of Laymen," "Our Creed and Life," "Temperance," "Organisation of Industry," "International Concord," "Expenditure," "Our Attitude towards War," "The Empire," "Progress," and in the Appendix, among other things, an address on "The Spiritual Ministry of Art."

The selection of topics, the Preface tells us, was determined on no definite plan, but the papers are all bound together by one underlying thought. To Westcott "the Incarnation" was the supreme fact in life, containing in itself implicitly the whole of religion, and throughout this book we see how that conviction ruled his thought and inspired his manifold activity.

The first paper, which is also the longest and most elaborate in the book, is on "The Position and Call of the English Church." It is divided into five sections, the first two of which were given as a sermon or address in Durham Cathedral, and the other three in St. Cuthbert's, Darlington, ten days later. Here we have a clear statement of Westcott's position. He believed with his whole heart in the Church and in the historic Episcopate, and yet this could not separate him in religious sympathy from those outside his own Church. He recognised the strength and the good works of non-Episcopal bodies, and could not deny the presence of Christ among any "who show the good fruits and love by which we are to know his disciples." "Is Catholicity," he asked, "determined by reference to the past alone? Can we call an opinion 'Catholic' when it is opposed to the deliberate convictions of multitudes of believers, not less fertile than we are in Christian works?"

He believed implicitly in the "Historic Creed" of Christendom, and in it, as we have said, held "the Incarnation" to be the supreme fact.

Christ, the Word, the Son of God, is Himself the Gospel. The Incarnation, the Nativity, the Transfiguration, the Passion, the Resurrection, the Ascension, are the final and absolute revelation to man of God's nature and will.

What was thus revealed was the open way for all men of "fellowship with the Father in Christ," or, in other words, "the participation in a Divine, eternal life, the foundation and the fulfilment of our present life"; and Westcott strongly insisted that these great truths grow in fulness with the growth of our life, through the constant presence of the illuminating Spirit. No Creed can fully express the truth; the life of the Church is always demonstrating and discovering, according to the measure of its fidelity, a fresh measure of the inexhaustible truth.

Thus we can understand Westcott's earnestness not only in the special affairs of the Church, but in the broader interests of the world, where he saw in the aspiration and endeavours of a true humanity the impulse of a Divine Spirit, ever unfolding more of the meaning of "fellowship with the Father in Christ." "As long as men are able to gain further insight into themselves or into the world, the age of Revelation is not closed." After the teaching of the Evangelical Revival, and of the Oxford movement (the one deficient in learning, the other in historical insight) Westcott welcomed the coming of a new age in which the fresh moulding forces of Christian thought should be "Physical Science, Historical Criticism, and Socialism in the proper sense of the word, as opposed to Individualism."

The resources of the earth, material and moral, are now laid open to us; the history of the past is disclosed with increasing fulness; the obligations involved in the solidarity of mankind are everywhere felt.

In each of these he saw the Divine significance, and pleaded that they could only be fully understood by those who were quickened by faith in the Incarnation, and saw "Christ's creative love" still active in the world. The message for our age he declared to be "Fellowship with the Father in Christ," which is possible to us now, because the spirit of sonship is revealed to us in the Incarnation, and is realised in all who through Christ "have access in one Spirit unto the Father."

Westcott while holding jealously to "the true divinity of the Son," to whom as "Creator and Redeemer" the humblest adoration must be rendered, yet deprecated the too frequent forgetfulness of the Father, "the fountain of Godhead, who is habitually spoken of in the New Testament absolutely as God in immediate connection with Christ, the Father, who sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins."

At the present time the right of access to the Father holds a small place in religion, and there is great need that we should meditate on this awe-inspiring privilege. On all sides we find a growing tendency in popular forms of worship, which is dominant in modern hymns addressed to "Jesus," to put, as it were, into the background the glory and the love of the Father, and so to weaken our sense of the unity, the spirituality, the majesty of God, though the regular use of the Old Testament, and especially of the Psalter, ought to guard us against this serious danger. The tendency springs from a natural sentiment which has elsewhere found expression in Mariolatry, and is more attractive because it corresponds with the temper of the time which strives to give a material shape to its loftiest thoughts.

In that significant passage, as it seems to us, we have the touch-stone by which the true interpretation of the whole Christian Gospel, as Westcott represented it, may be found. He himself accepted as absolutely given the facts of the "Historic Creed," which involves the Trinitarian formula; but his most luminous teaching concerning Life as the great revealer, and the constant presence of the Spirit, appears to us more firmly based and more profoundly true, when it is recognised that the Spirit takes of the things of Christ and reveals them to us, not as pertaining to "God the Son," but to the true human Child of God, while the constant Spirit is the one Eternal Father. This doubtless involves a breach with the "Historic Creed," but not, as we believe, with the fellowship of Christ's disciples and the spirit of his teaching.

Those who have learnt to value Westcott's teaching in such books as "Christus Consummator," "Social Aspects of Christianity," and "The Incarnation and Common Life," will be glad to have this last volume, though one would not choose it as the only one of his books to possess. It is miscellaneous in character, yet rich in interest, and full of the lofty and devout spirit of the man. One other passage we will quote from it in conclusion :—

Various influences are urging us now to work as we may and to pray for the Union of Christendom. The only way to Union, as far as I can see, is through life. All believers can heartily join in reliance on their Faith in such social reforms as those to which I have pointed. While much may appear to be uncertain, we can at least tell whether we desire to do the will of God. The effort to do it will bring us together by the power of the Holy Spirit, and when we are at fault He will guide us to the truth. Life will make us conscious of the action of God in us and through us; and the fruits of life will vindicate our divine fellowship in the sight of the world.

THE LIFE OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.*

THE publication of Stevenson's Life cannot be compared in literary importance to that of his Letters two years ago. Had the Life come first it would have achieved greater success, for it would have had the spice of novelty and whetted the appetite for the better things to come. As it is the glorious freshness of the Letters has made us fastidious. They are one of the chief joys which pure literature has brought to us in recent years. In themselves they contain such a vivid portrait of the man, that we seem to be in possession already of all the materials for criticising and correcting any other portrait which may be attempted. Mr. Sidney Colvin, too, discharged his duties as editor with admirable skill. His short introductions supply all the information that is really needed to weld the several groups of Letters into biographical unity. Mr. Leslie Stephen has used the same method with admirable effect in the delightful volume of Letters by J. R. Green, recently issued. We are inclined to think that for the great letter-writer this is the ideal form of biography, and wise men will hardly ask for more. However, in the case of Stevenson, the fates have willed otherwise, and Mr.

* "The Life of Robert Louis Stevenson." By Graham Balfour. London: Methuen and Co. Two volumes. 25s. net.

Graham Balfour has succeeded in spite of many difficulties in giving us a book of real merit, containing much which we should have been sorry to lose. His biography does not come upon us with the force of a revelation, but it is candid, fair, and affectionate, with a dash of hearty hero-worship which Stevenson himself would have loved. The difficulties are not, of course, of Mr. Balfour's own making. It is not his fault that we know and love his hero already.

The first volume in particular had to be a compilation from familiar materials. As we read, we are reminded continually of the quotations in Hamlet. It could not be otherwise if the story was to be re-told at all, and Mr. Balfour is quite right neither to omit nor to apologise. When the second volume is reached, the narrative seems to move more easily and to gain in vigour and freshness. Here the writer is dealing with scenes and incidents whose very distance and strangeness makes them piquant and romantic. He is himself familiar with the tropical life of the Pacific, and as a member for a time of Stevenson's household at Vailima he can describe the semi-patriarchal life in Samoa away from books and the distractions of civilisation with a true feeling for its atmosphere. It is this part of the book which really seems to give us something new, or at least something which we had not realized so clearly before.

There is in Stevenson a rare combination of qualities which is the source of his power over a multitude of readers in themselves very dissimilar in taste and temperament. Some are attracted by his mastery of style, others by the atmosphere pervading all his books, which is something different from style and is at the same time so subtly interwoven with it that the two can never really be separated. A still larger number are won by the way in which Stevenson gives himself to his readers and invites them into the circle of his friendship. All the really great prose writers have these three qualities—though they may possess them with varying degrees of emphasis—the feeling for the fitness and cadence of words, atmosphere and personality. Burke, Newman, and Matthew Arnold possess them, to name only three conspicuous instances, and Stevenson belongs to the same group. He has, it is true, been accused by some critics of allowing his care for the art of words to degenerate into a self-conscious artifice. This is a danger into which some great writers have not been able to save themselves from falling. There are passages by Walter Pater, which, in spite of the sensitive beauty of their texture, are marred by a self-conscious striving for effect and an air of fastidiousness which almost sinks into preciosity. We doubt, however, whether many readers feel this about Stevenson. There is nothing of the recluse about him. He belongs to no literary coterie. Everything he writes reflects his own healthy craving for reality. He is not to be accused of a self-conscious pose, because, unlike many literary craftsmen, he has told us the secrets of the workshop, and preached the morality of taking pains.

No one ever set himself more persistently than Stevenson to the "great task of happiness." He forced life to yield to him its maximum of enjoyment. In spite of his long battle against disease he kept the spirit of a school-boy out for a holiday to the end. This gaiety of heart was, however, only one side of his character. Below the surface there was an element of seriousness. He never outgrew his Scottish training. There was "something of the Shorter-Catechist" in his blood. His moral judgments were often unconventional, but he knew how to be stern to himself, and he could never tolerate the vices of weakness and a mean spirit in others. In many of the references to religion and its judgments of life which occur in his Letters and Essays, he has in mind the pious people who imagine that they glorify God by making things "dull and dowie." There is some of the exaggeration of the epigram in such sayings as "to be happy is the first step in being pious," or "the whole necessary morality is kindness"; but with what unerring instinct they recall us to some of the chief things which ecclesiastical religion is too liable to forget. Stevenson pleads with us to give larger room to the unconventional pieties of life. To do our work bravely and without murmuring at our lot, to bear our sorrows with self-control finding in them the discipline of God, to make the joys and burdens of other men our own, to encourage with our praise and admiration the true word and the brave deed, to say out what we mean about life and man and God "in fair and square human language," this, if he reads the riddle of the earth truly, is no small part of the whole duty of man.

Like many another when the time of reaction was over and his own life had to guide the spirit of his home and of the weak and dependent in his neighbourhood, Stevenson returned naturally to the religious habits of his childhood. Mr. Balfour has printed in an Appendix a collection of Vailima Prayers which Stevenson composed for use in his own household. Perhaps more than anything else in these two volnmes they add one more living touch to the picture, and bring us close to the real spirit of the man. We cannot finish this notice better than with one characteristic and beautiful extract:—

> The day returns and brings us the petty round of irritating concerns and duties. Help us to play the man, help us to perform them with laughter and kind faces, let cheerfulness abound with industry. . . . Give us to go blithely on our business all this day, bring us to our resting beds weary and content and undishonoured, and grant us in the end the gift of sleep.

THE MARROW OF TRADITION.*

The title of this book is borrowed from one of Charles Lamb's pithy sayings, and it is fully justified by the vital issue with which it deals. It is a patent fact that the proverbial "skeleton in the closet" of the Great Republic across the Atlantic is the race-question which becomes more burning as time goes on.

Many solutions have been tried, as widely different as that of the Pan-African Conference, lately held in London, with its demand for the highest intellectual culture, to that of the more practical, and so far as it has gone, the more successful scheme of Dr. Booker Washington in his Technical and Normal Institute at Tuskegee, Alabama. This institute already numbers thousands whom it has benefited, and its mission of practical usefulness is incalculable all over the South. But when we consider that there are nearly ten million negro or Afro-Americans, we can partly estimate the work yet to be done by the "architects of fate," amongst whom novelists may claim a place.

"The Marrow of Tradition" is a southern story of the present day, a sequel to the period described in the "Crisis," and later than the carpet-baggers and the Ku Klux which followed upon the conclusion of the Civil War in 1865, and complicated matters in the South. This present-day state of things adds to the value of the book, which is a very able exposition of the case. The work is compared to "Uncle Tom's Cabin," so great is its dramatic intensity and so strong its appeal to popular sympathy, and if Charles W. Chesnutt can produce anything like the effect that the work of Harriet Beecher Stowe produced a generation ago, he will deserve well of his country and of the reading and thinking people of all countries.

The scene is laid in a southern city where two-thirds of the inhabitants are coloured people, and where the dominant one-third of whites use the most unscrupulous means to disfranchise and degrade the majority. Major Carteret, the editor of the leading paper, uses all his influence, political as well as editorial, to create ill-feeling between the races, and his efforts culminate in a riot, when troops are called in and many innocent lives are sacrificed. Every device is resorted to in order to eject even the educated coloured people from the municipal government, and to intimidate the negroes so as to prevent them from availing themselves of their rights at the ballot-box. Typical characters, bad as well as good, white as well as coloured, are depicted with skill, and their strength and weakness are dramatically brought out in the course of the story, in which love episodes and family affections also find a place. But perhaps the greatest value of the book is the fact that there is nothing in the tale which might not occur, or has not really occurred, in actual life in the present day. It portrays the state of things in the South with only too true a verisimilitude. This has of late years been fully attested by the frequent lynchings that are the disgrace of our time, setting at defiance legislature and law, and bringing anarchy and barbarism into civilised life.

The work is well written in a judicial spirit and a lucid and incisive style. We welcome it in the spirit of Fiat Justitia that must prevail eventually before the race-question, North as well as South, can be solved in America. R. Moore.

THE HELPER FOR 1902.*

That "The Helper" is appreciated in our schools and homes is proved by the fact that the 1901 volume has been completely sold out, and while there are still copies of the three earlier volumes to be had (we advise our friends to complete their sets before it is too late), the new volume is sure of a very cordial welcome. Such a welcome it certainly deserves.

Are you in want of something suggestive for the very little ones? Have you a pair or more of explosive young mortals in the home circle who "take after somebody," and you don't know who, and do you want to settle them down a bit? Are you just a little in a fog yourself as to the Bible and our distinctive religious principles? Do you like looking at pretty things, and looking for marvellous things, by yourself (but not for yourself) or along with the children? Is it a story, or a carol, or quiet serious talk you want? Did you come to London to the "Twentieth Century meetings"—surely the best thing in their way that we have ever had, or are likely to have—and do you wish to be caught up again into the third heaven and hear the great inspiring words again which it was not *un*lawful for a man—or a woman—to utter? Is your eye fixed on the future of our churches; and do you want to get your forces into line, from school to church, and all to throb with the full healthy pulse of Christian endeavour? In short, do you want provoking unto good works of any kind, with and for your young people?

Then get the book and see what the Editor says next, for that is a passage from his opening address, and you will see that he does not promise more than the contents of this "Helper" amply justify.

The Sunday-school addresses at the great Whitsuntide gathering were well worth preserving in this form, and the papers on "Class, Guild, and Church" should also be specially noted as touching upon a movement which promises to be of far-reaching importance in our common life. Even those who cannot follow Mr. Priestley Evans in every particular will find much that is helpful and suggestive in the record of his experience, and both the Editor and Mr. Wood strongly emphasise the worth of the Guild. There is much help in this volume, as in its predecessors, for good sets of lessons, and the Editor contributes a useful series of notes for "Bible Lessons for the Year," which will interest parsons as well as other teachers; but the most delightful feature of the book is, to our mind, its stories and parables, including Miss K. F. Lawford's "Stories of the Early Italian Masters," and Mr. Thomas Robinson's "Nature Studies," illustrated by beautiful drawings, which are his own work. There are two sets of these studies, "Leaves: their Work and Beauty," and "Shore Life," the studies of which were made during the summer at Port Erin and Port St. Mary in the Isle of Man.

Of the stories proper, if we had to name one as most perfect in a small compass, we should choose "The Compact," by Miss Gertrude Martineau; there are two others of hers, and a longer story, touching and beautiful—"A Mission of Patience"—by Miss Laura G. Ackroyd; the four Story Lessons on "The Pearl of Great Price," by Mr. A. H. Biggs, are also full of interest and vivid teaching.

Among the verses are the following, by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas:—

Baby, thy wonder wakes anew
My own for lovely things of earth,
All things that loveliest grew
Are lovelier for thy birth.

This red rose takes thee with delight,
And revels in thy captured eyes;
In the dew of thy young sight
Its freshest beauties rise.

I had forgot the round-eyed days,
The rapture at life's rainbow gate:
Thou makest me by thy gaze
Heir to a lapsed estate.

This is enough to show how rich is the store gathered up in this new "Helper"; and again with the Editor we will say, "Be helped, I beg you."

ON THE EDITOR'S TABLE.

THE accumulation is appalling! And at the end of a year remorse clutches an unready pen, at least to confess what gratitude for good books was eager to do if only space and time had not forbidden. The books, everyone of them, are worth much fuller notice, and of some we shall still hope to write further.

But that two-handed engine at the door
Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more.

Meanwhile we must briefly note the chief of these, which have lain, some of them long and reproachfully, others not very long on our table, waiting for review. They cannot be exactly classified, but may be broadly grouped as follows:—

Religion and Religions.

The volume of "Christian Conference Essays," edited by the Rev. A. G. B. Atkinson and published last year (A. and C. Black, 5s. net) after an introduction by the Bishop of Hereford, opens with the striking essay by the late Professor Auguste Sabatier on "Christian Dogma and the Christian Life," and among the other essays includes Canon Barnett's on "The Church and Nationalism," and Dr. Brooke Herford's on "The Further Reformation Needed." The Editor tells of the useful function of this Christian Conference, and Dr. Horton writes a brief "Conclusion."

The eighth edition of Mr. A. J. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief," being notes introductory to the study of Theology, first published in 1895, is the more welcome because it contains a new Introduction, and a new concluding chapter, which gives a helpful summary of the argument. (Longmans. 6s. net.)

A word of cordial welcome to Professor Morris Jastrow's new book, "The Study of Religion," in the Contemporary Science Series! It is dedicated to Professor Tiele, and will be found full of interest for those who are devoted to the comparative study of religions. (Walter Scott. 6s.)

From many sides there come to us welcome testimonies to the foundation truths of the spiritual life of man. From New Zealand has come Dr. John Smith's "Truth and Reality: a Plea for the Unity of the Spirit and the Unity of Life in all its Manifestations," with an introductory note by Professor Flint, of Edinburgh (T. and T. Clark, 4s.); and from across the Atlantic "A Dynamic Faith," by Rufus M. Jones, Professor of Philosophy at Haverford College, which, having dealt with the Basis of Religion, goes on to speak of Mystics and Quakerism. (Headley Bros. 2s. 6d.) With these two may usefully be read Dr. Washington Gladden's "How Much is Left of the Old Doctrines? A Book for the People" (Jas. Clarke and Co., 4s.), and Dr. M. J. Savage's last book, "The Passing and the Permanent in Religion." (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.) Here may be also named a welcome volume of "Essays, Theological and Literary," by the late Professor Charles Carroll Everett, of Harvard, edited by Professor C. H. Toy, eight of the twelve essays being reprinted from the New World. We always looked eagerly for Dr. Everett's essays, and are thankful to have this volume, with its capital portrait. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, and Co.; London: Gay and Bird. 7s. net.)

The Bible.

The first volume of the International Handbooks to the New Testament, issued under the general editorship of Dr. Orello Cone, was Dr. Drummond's commentary on "The Epistles of Paul the Apostle," published in 1899. The second volume to appear was on "The Synoptic Gospels," by President Cary, of the Meadville Theological School, and we believe that Dr. Cone's volume on "Hebrews, Colossians, Ephesians, &c.," has also been published, though it has not yet reached us from across the Atlantic. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 7s. 6d. each volume.)

Professor R. G. Moulton was very popular as an Extension Lecturer before he went to Chicago. His larger work on "The Literary Study of the Bible," first published in 1896, reached a second edition, "revised and partly rewritten" two years ago (Isbister and Co., 10s. 6d.), and to this has now been added, "A Short Introduction to the Literature of the Bible," which, the author explains, is not an abridgment of the larger work, but is intended to help the general reader to enjoy the Bible as literature. (Isbister and Co. 3s. 6d.) The general reader should also make a point of reading "The Twentieth-Century New Testament," a translation into modern English to which more than one reference has already been made in these columns. The book has been issued in three parts, and the first which contains the Gospels and the Book of Acts, is already in an eighth edition. (Horace Marshall. Pt. I., 1s. 6d.; Pt. II. 1s.; Pt. III., 1s., or in one volume, 3s. 6d.) Another most excellent book is the "Biblical Introduction," by Professors W. H. Bennett and W. F. Adeney, of New College, London, published two years ago, the former dealing with the Old Testament, the latter with the New. (Methuen and Co. 7s. 6d.) Professor Adeney is also the general editor of "The Century Bible," a series of excellent little handbooks, in which the New Testament is being issued in thirteen volumes, with Introductions and Commentary, from the liberal orthodox point of view. The volume before us is on "The General Epistles: James, Peter, John, and Jude," by Professor Bennett. (T. C. and E. C. Jack. 2s. net.) Professor Agar Beet's "Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans" has reached a ninth edition, which has been carefully rewritten, embodying "the writer's mature thought about the greatest work of the greatest of the apostles of Christ." (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)

The Church, Leaders, and Preachers.

The first volumes of the series of "World's Epoch Makers" we have already noticed, but have received several other volumes which promise most interesting reading. The Rev. W. Fairweather writes on "Origen and Greek Patristic Theology," Professor John Herkless on "Francis and Dominic and the Mendicant Orders," the Rev. A. C. Welch on "Anselm," and the Rev. G. M'Hardy on "Savonarola." There is also a volume on "Muhammad and his Power," by Mr. P. de Lacy Johnstone. (T. and T. Clark. 3s. each volume.) In the "Heroes of the Reformation" series, Professor S. M. Jackson, of New York, writes on "Huldreich Zwingli," the book being very liberally illustrated. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.) Dr. Alexander Mackennal's "Sketches in the Evolution of English Congregationalism" are the Carew Lecture for 1900-01, delivered in Hartford Theological Seminary, Connecticut, and contain a timely exposition of the principles of the body of which the author is so distinguished a member. (J. Nisbet and Co. 5s.)

In the series of "Small Books on Great Subjects," the Rev. W. Garrett Horder's "Supreme Argument for Christianity: an Appeal to Facts" was published two years ago. Among the books which contain material for a fuller presentment of the argument of his four lectures, Mr. Horder mentions C. L. Brace's "Gesta Christi," and Seeley's "Ecce Homo." More recent additions to the series are Dr. John Pulsford's "Infoldings and Unfoldings of the Divine Genius in Nature and Man," and Dr. P. T. Forsyth's "The Taste of Death and the Life of Grace," each thoroughly characteristic of its author, and well worth reading. (James Clarke and Co. 1s. 6d. each volume.) No one could look at the portrait in the Rev. T. T. Munger's "Horace Bushnell, Preacher and Theologian," and not long to read the book. It is the fullest biography of that broad-minded American divine that has yet appeared. (James Clarke and Co. 6s.) Dr. John Brown's (of Bedford) "Puritan Preaching in England: A Study of Past and Present," is the Lyman Beecher Lectures on "Preaching," delivered at Yale in October, 1899. Beginning with the Friars, Dr. Brown touches on Colet, Bunyan, Baxter, and other elder preachers, and then comes to Binney, Spurgeon, Dale, and Maclaren, of Manchester. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.) The Rev. J. H. Jowett also has an address on "The Secrets of Effective Preaching," in his volume of sermons, "Apostolic Optimism" (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.); and, finally, we note that Sir Edward Russell is also among the preachers, as readers of the Liverpool Daily Post well know. The Bishop of Hereford writes an introduction to the sermons, preached for the most part through the columns of the Daily Post, "An Editor's Sermons on Days of the Christian Year, and Other Subjects." (Fisher Unwin. 6s. net.)

Miscellaneous.

"The Heart of the Empire" is a volume of essays by men of University standing, who have gained first-hand knowledge of the most vital problems of modern city life by residence in settlements or block-dwellings, or by otherwise coming into direct contact with the working population in the poorest quarters. The essay on "Imperialism" stands somewhat apart from the rest, but will reward a patient reading. The other essays are also various in tone and quality, dealing with Education, Charity, Temperance, the Church, &c. We note especially the valuable essay on "The Housing Problem," by Mr. F. W. Lawrence, M.A., of the Mansfield House Settlement. The book quickly reached a second edition. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

"Tolstoy and His Problems" gathers up a number of essays by Aylmer Maude, one of the best known interpreters of the great Russian in this country. The last essay is on "The Doukhobors: A Russian Exodus." (Grant Richards. 6s.)

Dr. Benjamin Rand has made a valuable contribution to English philosophical literature in his substantial volume of "The Life, Unpublished Letters, and Philosophical Regimen of Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury, author of the 'Characteristics' (1671-1713)." Shaftesbury is dealt with in Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory," under the section, "Æsthetic Ethics." (Sonnenschein and Co. 15s.)

"A Literary History of America," by Professor Barrett Wendell, of Harvard, will have a special interest for many of our readers. To its study of New England writers, Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, and others, we must return again. "The Literary History of India" in the same series we have already noticed. (Fisher Unwin. 16s.)

Mr. Augustine Birrell brought a delightful freshness into the world of letters with his "Obiter Dicta," the first volume of which appeared in 1884. The two volumes of his "Collected Essays," including both series of "Obiter Dicta," "Res Judicatae," and "Essays about Men, Women, and Books," are companions we are glad to have close at hand (Elliot Stock, 12s.); and whoever enjoys listening to Mr. Birrell will also welcome his last volume of "Miscellanies," though they are very miscellaneous, and not quite like the earliest essays. Mr. Birrell has the virtue of making us want to know more, and to read the books he talks about. The "Miscellanies" include an address on Walter Bagehot, a lecture on the House of Commons, and an article from the Contemporary on Sir Robert Peel. (Elliot Stock. 5s.)

Sir Henry Thompson's book on "Modern Cremation, its History and Practice," is in a third edition, revised and much enlarged from the edition of 1891. It deals in a thoroughly practical manner with a subject of great importance, especially to our crowded city populations, and enforces the author's arguments of twenty-five years ago by the results of subsequent experience. (Smith, Elder and Co. 2s.)

Two books about children we would gladly have lingered over—"Children's Sayings, edited with a Digression on the Small People," by William Canton (Isbister and Co., 2s. 6d.), and Mrs. C. P. (Stetson) Gilman's "Concerning Children," which will be of special interest to readers of her "Women and Economics." (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.)

SHORT NOTICES.

The Unitarian Students at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, in the Nineteenth Century (1796-1901) is a little book which must have involved a great deal of patient work. It is compiled by an old student of the College, the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., of Aberdare, and will be found of great interest to all who care for Davies and Davis, Evans, Jones, and Williams, and their brethren. The first student whose record is given is David Davis (1747-1846), eldest son of David Davis, of Castell Hywel, and brother of Timothy Davis, of Evesham. How these two were mixed up with some early trouble about the exclusion of Unitarian students from Carmarthen may be seen from Mr. Jones's pages, where, in an appendix, some contemporary letters from Dr. Abraham Rees and others are printed. (The book may be had from the Rev. R. J. Jones, Broniestin, Aberdare. (Cloth, 1s. 6d.; roan, gilt edges, 2s., post free).

Dukinfield Old Chapel Sunday-school Centenary Souvenir, 1900, is in form a companion volume to the Rev. Alexander Gordon's "Historical Account of Dukinfield Chapel and its School." It contains pictures of the school building (old and new), the chapel, and portraits of the ministers and a number of other workers, and a full account of the centenary celebrations. (To be had of Mr. E. B. Broadrick, Mona Bank, Dukinfield. 1s. 6d. net; postage, 4d.)

The Sceptre without a Sword, by George Matheson, D.D., is a Christmas booklet, with a decorative border to each page, printed in one restful colour, a plea for the dominion of a Divine Humanity as it is seen in Christ. (James Clarke and Co. 1s.)

Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities is a most useful annual volume, of which we have received the issue for 1902. The charities are arranged in alphabetical order, with particulars as to object, chief officials, address, &c. Among them we find the B. and F.U.A., a most useful charity, and, curiously enough, the "Presbyterian Church of England Theological College," now established as Westminster College, at Cambridge. Dr. Williams's Library we also find, but not the Presbyterian Board. (Chatto and Windus. 1s. 6d.)

In Memoriam Verses for Every Day in the Year, by Lucy Ridley, is a collection especially designed for the comfort of mourners, or for use on memorial-cards and tombstones. The verses are well selected and cover a wide range of authors, from Michael Angelo, Chaucer, and Shakespeare, down to Longfellow, A. A. Proctor, and the Rossettis. (Chatto and Windus. 2s. 6d. cloth, 3s. 6d. leather.)

THE CITY OF MANY GATES.

I USED to think the city had but one gate to it. I had only heard of one, and thought, indeed, that it could not be possible for it to have more; and so thought those around me. But the time came when my eyes were opened, and I beheld the city as it really is—a City of many Gates. Around its walls are men, alone or in small groups, moving endlessly, all seeking entrance to the place of life. They never seem to weary in the search; the generations come and go, but for ever that walled city has its human throngs without—the questioners and seekers after life. Never, until the final darkness falls upon the earth, shall the mighty attraction of its mysteries cease for men.

True it is that, as they come, they are almost turned back—nay, some have turned and given up the glorious hope—for there in the highway towards the city stood a linked crowd of dark-clad warning-givers. Their voices and their language seemed of some earlier, darker age, and ever they strove to weaken the strong glad heart by declaring that only one gate gave entrance to the city—a low-built, narrow entry, a true "passing under the yoke"—a gateway which, though some called it Jewish and some Christian, all named it as the Law, whether of Moses, of God, or of the Church. But the seekers broke through these croaking hindrances—even rudely at times—and pressed on; for above the cries of "Orthodoxy!" and "the Creed!" (the threatening war-notes of the mediævalists) they heard strange, luring songs from the city's streets, chants and odes of the joy and glory of the workers there, echoes of the music of the holy life; and heard, too, the sounds of "Welcome!" uttered in many different tongues by watchmen on the walls. For the watchmen of that city have but one task—to bring in, and not to keep out.

The wanderers came to the first gate—that named the gate of Conscience. Here stood a sentry, who seemed most severe in look. He asked of those who felt drawn by that entrance, what were their aims? Were they themselves sincere and earnest? Did they seek the True, in all its stern simplicity? Did they gladly accept the hard commands of Duty? Were they resolved to look well and thoroughly to themselves, to their regard for their comrades, to their love for the Holiest? And though many looked doubtfully upon the ground, and kept silence till that gate should close, others, with bright firm-set faces walked gladly through the gateway.

But the rest said—it is a hard entrance; we hesitate before a city so austere in its demands; we seek the sunlight of eternal summer, not the chill greyness of November. So they went out into the open places again. But before they had gone far they found another gate, called the gate Beautiful. Over it was written in letters of gold: "He hath made everything beautiful in its time." And that magic sentence seemed to throw a charm over all they saw. The gate itself grew into something of mystical, sensuous fascination for them: it changed all they saw as they looked through: the robed sentry, mild and winning in his smile, dignified in all his movements, was part of a picture in which even the streets, with their golden glories, their jewelled walls and windows were transformed. And through it all flowed a stream of song and music, whose very sadness wooed. Many entered by that way, softly, and with folded hands.

But others turned sharply away. "I must be compelled," said one. And as he said it he found himself at a gate called Mystery. The gate itself was wonderful; it rested on a cloud, and, above it soared away into the clouds of the unscaled heavens. The people in the streets within walked gravely as in the midst of things they could not understand, whilst in and out went those who, by their manner, seemed a kind of priestly race. And when such common elements of life as bread and wine changed (as they thought)—took a new life to themselves—the people's reverence seemed ecstatic. Those only who longed for such a way entered.

The rest moved onwards, about the walls, till they reached a gate called the Spiritual. Yet, even as they looked upon it, the gate itself became but an appearance, a semblance—for it seemed to melt away to limitless space—the walls passing with it, till all bounds had gone. It seemed to throw a new glory over the city, a halo of light, wherein nothing mean, nor harsh, nor animal, nor hopeless, could exist, but where the ideal shone everywhere. Actions had a deeper significance, for the soul was their origin—the glimpses of landscape were soft and radiant as with the breath of God. Poet and prophet, seers into the texture of things, were the true dwellers in a city become "the soul's sphere of infinite images"—where all heaven seemed opening through man and bird and flower and stream. All was transparent, spiritual, divine. "Break the stone, and thou shalt find me: cleave the wood and there am I."

Yet many faltered before such high vision, and, though their hearts beat with wild new impulse, that gate seemed not for them. And they might have left the city to the seers and mystics, had they not found another gate—the gate of Love. As they beheld it, their faces shone with joy. It was no sombre, gloomy, heavily-built arch. It might have sprung from a rosebush—this flower-laden circlet of the Eternal Love. The perfume of human kindness drew them, and the sounds from within. And as they came nearer, and heard the trembling air laden with songs of sympathy, and saw the deeds that love alone can do—beheld the streets of the city filled with willing hearts and hands at work for those who suffer, or have fallen, are sick, or lonely, or anxious, or perplexed—and then as, looking upward, they beheld Love's banner, with the cross upon it, glowing there at the central Glory—for "God is Love"—they could not be restrained, but entered with songs of gladness, asking no other portal.

Other gates there are giving entrance to that city of God on earth men call Religion—the city through whose midst runs "the river of water of Life, clear as crystal." And while some enter by one gate, and some by another, the angelic song of "peace and goodwill" is more and more filling the air, until the day draws near when none shall speak harshly of another's choice. For in that day will all be glad that, whether by outward Law or inward Conscience, power of Mystery or charm of Beauty, by the Spirit's height or Love's depth, each entrance has its own appearance of perfection (for "each of the several gates was of one pearl"), and all paths end in Him to Whom at last no Temple need be raised.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GOOD-BYE to the Old Year—the first year of the New Century finished! Has it been a happy year to you? Have you at least tried to make it a good year, and to make others happy in it?

I hope, at any rate, that you have all had a very happy Christmas, and I hope you liked the Children's Column last week.

This week we can only have a little space for the children; but I want to ask you one question: Have you got the new volume of Young Days? But perhaps you have been taking it in the monthly parts all through the year. The bound volume is to be had from the Sunday School Association, at Essex Hall, and costs 1s. 6d. It makes a charming book for the children, with a great many interesting things in in it, and plenty of good stories. If you don't think so, read the little story which begins the March number, on p. 33, called "Robbie's Victory," and then read p. 84, "As Good as a Horse," and "Nannie's Little Minute," which begins on p. 109, and Dr. Edward Everett Hale's story, which begins the December number on p. 177, "Asaph Sheafe's Christmas." A good many of the best things in this book are borrowed from America.

In one little corner there is a saying worth thinking about, but perhaps it is more for the teacher than the children:

A teacher said to a boy who had the reputation of being very bad: "How many bad boys does it take to make a good one?" "One, sir, if you treat him well," was the answer.

Two things always interesting in "Young Days" are the Guild Work and Aunt Amy's reports about the Young Days Cot at Winifred House. If any of you do not know about that, be sure and look.

Earlier in the year I printed these verses for the children, and asked, Who wrote them?

A sparrow with its plain brown coat—
The best it ever wore—
Has no sweet song or cheerful note;
A chirp—and nothing more.

Yet as it hops from bough to bough,
Or flies from tree to tree;
As if it cared not where, or how,
As restless as can be;

Or, by a leaf well sheltered, sleeps,
Its head beneath its wing;
God watches, cares for it, and keeps
The thoughtless little thing.

And if He keeps the sparrow so,
Why should I ever fear?
Life has its troubles—but I know
God's loving help is near!

They are in a little book, "Sunday Sunshine: New Hymns and Poems for the Young" (London: James Nisbet and Co., Berners-street. 1858), and the Preface is dated from London, October, 1857. There are 150 poems in the book, all in the same kind of verse, and four verses each. They were written by someone who knew how good it was for children to learn pieces by heart, and she wrote all these—for I think she must have been a lady; but this about the sparrow seems to me the only one really worth remembering. Who was she?

THE YEAR'S RECORD.

A FRIEND, whose letter will be found in another column, reproves the "almost unrelieved gloom" of our Christmas leader. It was not our intention to leave any such impression. The thought of all that has happened in South Africa since last Christmas does indeed lay a heavy burden on every thoughtful mind and sensitive heart, even of those who are sincerely convinced that no blame can attach to our country in this great tragedy, and we did not dare to write of Christmas, and its natural joy, as though that heavy burden were no concern of ours.

But looking back upon the past year we find abundant reasons for thankfulness, and in the face of the worst that has happened, cannot despair of our country. Even out of the agony of this miserable conflict we firmly believe that good will yet arise, though we cannot yet forecast what trials we as a people may have first to endure, and what the ultimate issue in South Africa will be.

We are thrown back on the first principles of our faith and of our patriotism as citizens of a great nation. The first principle is to trust in a GOD of Righteousness, in whose presence Mammon must be set down from his shameless pedestal. In the glorious union of English-speaking peoples, which circles the earth, we have to remember, and fight to the death to maintain it, that we stand for truth and honour, and not might above right; that true humanity is based upon integrity, and has its perfect flower in unaffected brotherly love, in sympathy with the suffering and the oppressed, in defence of the defenceless. We have to remember that the British flag flies for liberty, and if we desire that the name of England should be still held in honour throughout the world, we have to set ourselves with a new determination and self-sacrifice, to nurture a race of true citizens at home.

In this endeavour a special contribution has to be made by our Free Churches. As citizens, the cause of national education, of temperance, of providence, of the housing of the people, must receive our strenuous and enlightened service, and in our churches we must keep the springs of inspiration fresh.

The year has brought us much encouragement. In the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in Whit-week, there was a wonderful refreshment. Then we became aware, as never before, of a wider fellowship with earnest men and women of like mind and the same aspirations in many lands and in every quarter of the globe. We realised that their steadfast witness was often under far greater difficulties and discouragements than our own, and that of us it was required to extend a whole-hearted sympathy, and that there should be in us a strength and courage which might help to make them strong.

So out of this festival of the Spirit and of brotherly love arose again that earnest call to look to our churches, to see to it, that there the true spirit of devotion and self-forgetfulness had its home, and that it should be no mere declaration of words, if we reverently confessed, "The rock of our strength, our refuge is in GOD."

This year will be remembered as that in which the first £20,000 was given to establish a Superannuation Fund for ministers in connection with our National Conference, and it is a happy augury for the coming time to be assured that this is now accomplished—happy not merely on account of the money, but of the devoted work and the generous giving out of which it has sprung. These are marks of a united people who realise that they have a common cause and are determined that it shall be worthily maintained.

With this and other good omens, we will thank GOD and take courage; and for ourselves, in what THE INQUIRER can do for the common cause, we will face the future in a like spirit. The grave of this particular Editor may soon be covered over with smooth green grass, but the cause will be maintained, and Truth will prosper yet.

CHRIST did not say, "if any man will come after me, let him take up a cross and follow me." No! it is "let him take up his cross," that thing which is most disagreeable, painful to us, that thing whose shadow darkens our lives. That is the thing we are asked to bear, and to bear not complainingly, not stoically, but trustingly, and, if possible, cheerfully.—M. P. Wills.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1901.

THE opening year of the New Century brought with it a great and unaffected sorrow for our whole people in the death of Queen Victoria—a sorrow shared in greater or less degree by all the civilised nations of the world. On New Year's Day the inauguration of the new Commonwealth of Australia had been celebrated with impressive observances, when Lord Hopetoun took the oath as Governor-General and the first Federal Ministry was sworn, and a message of warm sympathy was received from the Queen. But for her the end was drawing very near, and on January 22, at Osborne, she peacefully passed away, in her eighty-second year. Of her long and beneficent reign of sixty-three years, of the great changes it had brought, of the marvellous progress of the country and the extension of her dominions, much was worthily said and written, but the most heartfelt words of sorrowful tribute and gratitude were spoken of the Queen herself, of her influence as Woman, even more than as far-seeing Statesman—the Mother of her people.

The solemn pageant of her funeral, by sea and land, will long be vivid in the remembrance of those who witnessed it at any point; and we must feel that her son, who is now our King, Edward VII., entered upon his reign with true and noble feeling. The King's messages to the people, to India, and to the dominions of Greater Britain touched the true note of sympathy; and the bonds of sympathy between those other lands and the Mother-country were still more closely drawn, when the King, in fulfilment of Queen Victoria's purpose, sent his son, the Duke of York, to open the first Parliament of United Australia, and at the same time to visit the other great dominions of the Empire. Everywhere the Duke and Duchess were enthusiastically received, from Australia proceeding to New Zealand, and thence to Natal and the Cape, and finally to Canada, where they traversed the Continent, to the Pacific coast, before their return. The King, after his son's return, created him Prince of Wales.

Throughout the year the war in South Africa has dragged on its miserable course, and has led to the proclamation of martial law even in Cape Colony itself. The policy of devastation carried out by the British troops, destroying the homes of the people and their means of subsistence, led to the concentration of the women and children in "Refuge Camps" in the Transvaal and Orange River territory, where unsanitary conditions and insufficient equipment resulted in an appalling death-rate among the children, evils of which Miss Hobhouse months ago warned the Government, and which at last are being remedied. The burdened memories of this year are, perhaps, best passed over in silence.

In September William McKinley, who had just entered on a second term of office as President of the United States of America, fell by the hand of an Anarchist assassin at Buffalo, meeting his death, when the first hopes of recovery proved to be vain, with fearlessness and a simple, manly faith. As with our Queen at the beginning of the year, so with President McKinley, the deep sympathy especially of all English-speaking peoples watched with his own fellow-citizens during the days of keen anxiety, and sorrowed at his death. In the government of the great Republic the insane crime made no break. Vice President Roosevelt quietly took the vacant place, and it has since been thankfully recognised that the direct choice of the people could not have called a worthier man to that high office.

In September, also, was celebrated at Winchester the thousandth anniversary of Alfred the Great, King of Wessex, the traditional date of his death falling in October. The two commemorations of Alfred and Victoria, separated by a thousand years, brought home to the people the true ideal of honour and humanity and unaffected goodness, of loyalty to duty and earnest religiousness, in which what is best in the English character is seen, and without which the greatness of a people cannot be maintained.

The year's record in the matter of education has not been encouraging. The confusion caused by the Cockerton judgment was by no means ended by the Government Bill passed after the withdrawal of a more ambitious measure, and the questions involved in the desire for one authority for all grades of schools, elementary, secondary and technical, and particularly in the differences as to what that authority shall be, have yet to be thrashed out.

Scotland is happier than England in this respect, and received an added bounty in Mr. Carnegie's great gift of £2,000,000, to be devoted to the payment of the University fees of poor students.

In the cause of Temperance much devoted work has been done. The wide circulation of Rowntree and Sherwell's "Temperance Problem and Social Reform" has had a most valuable educative influence, and the advocates of the recommendations of Lord Peel's Minority Report have kept the subject well before the people. Much attention has been drawn to various experiments in the direction of "Public-house Trusts." The Children's Bill, which comes into force on New Year's Day, is a small mercy, if indeed it can be so described, forbidding the sale of drink to children under 14, except in corked and sealed vessels.

ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS.

For the Church of England the year has been one of many changes, while acute controversies seem to have been in abeyance. The Archbishop of Canterbury, indeed, happily celebrated his eightieth birthday on Nov. 30, but three most distinguished bishops have been called away, and a fourth has retired from active work. In January Dr. Creighton, the Bishop of London, died and was succeeded by Dr. Winnington-Ingram, who had been Suffragan Bishop of Stepney. In April the call came to another distinguished historian, Dr. Stubbs, Bishop of Oxford, in whose place the very Rev. Francis Paget, Dean of Christ Church, was appointed, the Rev. T. B. Strong succeeding to the Deanery. Then in July the greatest bishop of them all, Dr. Westcott of Durham, passed away, the successor of Lightfoot, and, like him, great as a scholar and as a bishop. To Durham Professor H. C. G. Moule, also a Cambridge scholar, has been appointed, and on the retirement of Dr. Perowne, Canon Gore has been made Bishop of Worcester. Bishop Welldon, of Calcutta, who came home in ill-health, and was not able himself to preach the striking sermon he had prepared for the Church Congress at Brighton, has received the Canonry at Westminster which the Bishop of Worcester vacates.

At the opening of the new century many leaders of the great Nonconformist bodies, organised by the Evangelical Free Church Council, took part in a United Mission, vigorously carried out, in London first, where Dr. Parker preached the first sermon before the Lord Mayor, in the Guildhall, and afterwards in the country, both in towns and villages. Great enthusiasm was thrown into the work of preparation and into the actual campaign by armies of helpers, and those who thus took part in a great united effort experienced the quickening of a new life, while hopeful reports were given of the good done outside; yet it was confessed that the great masses of the unchurched were not reached. At the annual gathering of the Evangelical Free Church Council held at Cardiff in March, the Rev. J. G. Greenhough, the President, spoke with faith and hope of the coming time. For fifteen centuries, he said, they had been fighting for isms; the Church of the Twentieth Century was going to fight for Christ.

As last year was marked by the great act of re-union, out of which sprang the United Free Church of Scotland, so this year there has been, if not so great a consummation, yet a sufficiently striking approach towards union between the Baptists and Congregationalists, and a serious effort towards closer union among the Congregationalists themselves. In April a united meeting of the Baptist and Congregational Unions was held in London, where the two Presidents, Dr. Maclaren and Dr. Parker, gave their addresses, and Principal Rainy, the first Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland, gave his blessing to the brethren. Dr. Parker's address was on "The United Congregational Church," a subject which he further elaborated at the autumnal gathering of the Congregational Union in Manchester. A resolution was then passed directing the Committee to lay this subject, as a matter of vital importance, before the Churches and County Unions, and to report to a subsequent meeting of the Assembly. Dr. Parker's two addresses have now been issued in a pamphlet, and the subject has been submitted to the churches as directed. The idea is that while the autonomy of each church must be strictly preserved under the headship of Christ alone, there are many things which can be most effectively ordered by a central representative council of a "United Congregational Church," as, for instance, the support of colleges, the help of weaker churches, the sustentation of the ministry, the oversight of the admission of candidates for the ministry, the superannuation of ministers, and the direction of missions at home and abroad. The result of this proposal will be looked for with great interest.

Another event of the year was the the meeting in September of the third Œcumenical Methodist Council in London, the first having been held twenty years ago, also in London, the second at Washington in 1891. Representatives of the great Methodist churches of America, and from all parts of the world, were present. The 500 delegates represented, it was said, thirty millions of Methodists of various race and colour.

Matters of more personal interest were the celebration in Edinburgh in January of the ministerial jubilee of Dr. Walter Smith, the author of "Olrig Grange" and other well-known poems, and more recently of the twenty-one years of Dr. Horton's ministry at Hampstead. Dr. P. T. Forsyth, formerly of Cambridge, has entered on his duty as Principal of Hackney (Congregational) College in Finchley-road, and Dr. John Hunter has also come to London, removing from Glasgow to the King's Weigh House Chapel.

OUR FREE CHURCHES.

For our own community the great event has been the meeting at Whitsuntide of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in London, the first meeting of the Council established in the previous year at Boston, Mass., with the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter as President, and the Rev. C. W. Wendté as Secretary. The Council was attended by distinguished representatives of Liberal Religion in many lands, and the meetings were full of inspiration, and a most happy sense of unity in the great essentials of faith and the religious life. The whole proceedings were fully reported in these columns, and the papers were printed from week to week, and have since been published in a volume, so that no further chronicle need be given here.

Among many New Century celebrations the first was of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, which held a united service of consecration at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, and inaugurated a vigorous Forward Movement. Later a United Devotional service was held in Little Portland-street Chapel, by the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, and a united meeting in Birmingham, postponed on account of the Queen's death, was held in March, when the Rev. Stopford Brooke was the special preacher.

The Southern Association New Century Fund of over £1,000 has been successfully raised, and in Wales an appeal has been made for a similar fund of £3,000, not yet raised. In other districts also, the call of the New Century to fresh consecration and more strenuous work has been heard, and many signs of activity have been apparent. Among the New Century gatherings may be mentioned the pleasant Unitarian Pilgrimage to Catterick, organised by the Teesside Committee of the Northumberland and Durham Association in July.

Whitsuntide was marked not only by the great International Meetings, but by special Sunday-school celebrations and the inauguration of two movements which promise to be of the greatest practical benefit to our Church life. At a meeting in Little Portland-street Chapel the National Conference Guilds' Union was established, with the Rev. John Ellis as secretary, and has since issued a Guild Manual; and at a meeting in Essex Hall the first public appeal for a Ministers' Superannuation Fund was made. This appeal, by the special Committee of the National Conference, led by the President, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, has since been most vigorously prosecuted, with such success that we fully hope to hear before the year is out that the capital sum of £20,000, asked for to secure the establishment of the Fund, has been raised, and the further annual subscription list of £300.

Early in the year Mr. Carpenter delivered a course of public lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" at Leeds, Bolton and Liverpool, and it was a pleasant incident that just before the course began, Oxford University had conferred on him a Master's degree. In the autumn the lectures were also given at Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen and Newcastle-on-Tyne, while other lectures, which were very warmly appreciated, were given by Mr. Carpenter, Mr. P. H. Wicksteed and Mr. Fripp in Manchester College, Oxford, in connection with the Summer Meeting of University Extension Students. Mr. Fripp's lectures on "The Mediæval Chronicler in England" were subsequently published in these columns.

During the year we have benefited by the visits of several of our friends to distant lands. In the spring Mr. Herbert Rix and Mr. Jupp were in Palestine, and Mr. Philip Higginson also, all of whom are ready to share their experiences by means of lectures. Mr. Armstrong made a journey to Iceland and Denmark, bringing us into closer touch with the new Liberal movement in Copenhagen, and also attended the meeting of the Dutch Protestantenbond at Utrecht in the autumn. In August Miss Tagart led a party of Unitarians on a visit to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary, of which a pleasant record has been furnished in these columns. The visitors were unfortunately obliged to return before the opening of the New College buildings at Kolozsvár, the date of which had to be postponed.

During the year new churches have been opened at Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Leicester (Free Christian Church), Wood Green, and Moss Side, and a new meeting-room has been opened attached to the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool. Foundation-stones of new churches at Merthyr Tydfil and at Birkenhead have been laid, and the Great Hucklow Holiday Home of the Manchester District S.S. Association has been completed, under the superintendence of the Rev. S. H. Street. Here we may also note that the foundation-stone of the new Unitarian church at Auckland, New Zealand, was laid in the summer, and this church is perhaps already completed. For this a gift of £320 was sent out from the Mother Country. The Bi-centenary of the Old Meeting at Mansfield was happily celebrated in September.

This year Dr. Brooke Herford celebrated his ministerial jubilee, and on his retirement from Rosslyn-hill Chapel many friends joined with members of his old congregations in this country and in America in making a personal gift to him of over £2,000.

Early in the year the congregation of North Gate-end Chapel made a presentation to the Rev. F. E. Millson on the completion of twenty-nine years of his ministry in Halifax, and the jubilee of Mr. J. H. Reynolds at the Lower Mosley-street Schools, in Manchester, was similarly celebrated. On the retirement of Mr. David Martineau from the office of Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, which he had held for thirty years, he was elected President, and his portrait, by Mr. Arthur Hacker, A.R.A., was presented to him by a large number of friends. Another member of our community to whom honour has been done by a greater public is Mr. William Rathbone, of Liverpool, whose statue was unveiled in the summer, in a place of honour by St. George's Hall, and of whom a bust has also been given to University College, Liverpool. A window has been placed in the Ullett-road Church, Liverpool, in memory of the late Charles Beard; and a memorial tablet to the late C. L. Corkran was recently unveiled in Mansford-street Church, Bethnal Green.

BOOKS.

Among books of special interest which have appeared during the year may be noted the second volume of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," and the first volume of a Jewish Encyclopædia, the three supplemental volumes of the "Dictionary of National Biography," the correspondence between Dr. Martineau and Professor W. Knight in "Inter Amicos," and the English translation of Harnack's popular lectures on "What is Christianity?" M. Jean Réville has published an important work on the Fourth Gospel, and another notable book is the Rev. James Moffat's "The Historical New Testament." The new and cheaper edition of the "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," by the late John Hamilton Thom, Dr. Vance Smith's new edition of his "Bible and its Theology," and Mr. Armstrong's "Makers of the Nineteenth Century" are among the most welcome of the books added to our store. Of chapel histories we note the Chester bicentenary volume, "Matthew Henry and his Chapel," by the Rev. H. D. Roberts.

Among Mr. Philip Green's recent publications have been a re-issue of the late John Wright's useful tracts in a volume, "Denials and Beliefs of Unitarians," Mr. Hargrove's "Sermons and Impressions brought from America," and "Our Reasonable Service," Mrs. A. C. Osler's "Life's Upper School," Mr. Travers Herford's "Unitarian Affirmations," with which should be remembered also his Provincial Assembly sermon "Back to Jesus," Mr. R. B. Drummond's "Christology of the New Testament," Mr. T. J. Hardy's "A Confession of Heresy and a Plea for Frankness," and most recently, "A Minister of God," Selections from the Special Sermons and Addresses of John Hamilton Thom, edited, with a memoir, by V. D. Davis.

The Sunday School Association has also issued several new books:—Mr. Sunderland's five lectures of "Travel and Life in Palestine," a new and enlarged edition of Miss C. A. Martineau's "Voices of Nature and Lessons from Science," Miss Marian Pritchard's "Series of Hymn Lessons," with Wall Hymn Sheets and Pictures; Miss F. E. Cooke's "Story of St. Francis of Assisi," Mr. Hawkes' new children's play "The Unambitious Queen," Mr. V. D. Davis's "Twelve Hymns and their Writers," and, of course, the volume of "Young Days," and a new volume of "The Helper."

INDIA.

In the autumn of this year we had looked forward to welcoming the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams home, on the completion of his three years of service as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in India; but, as our readers are aware, Mr. Williams came home earlier in the year, in broken health, and we have since had to mourn his death. We are thus deprived of the further help we should have gained from his counsels, after the wide experience he had gathered, but his valuable reports of work and of impressions of the needs and the religious condition of that great country remain with us, and this experience must draw closer than ever the bonds of sympathy which unite us with our brethren of the Brahmo Somaj. The Brahmo papers are a constant and most welcome channel of intercourse with our friends, and recently we have had to welcome two new-comers, a fresh monthly issue of Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar's magazine, The Interpreter and the Young Man, of which the first number appeared in August, and a substantial weekly paper, New India, edited by Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, of which the first number is dated Aug. 12. "For God, Humanity, and the Fatherland," is Mr. Pal's motto; and in the first number he declared his high aim "to voice the deepest thoughts and the noblest aspirations of New India."

OBITUARY.

First in our thoughts among those who have passed away during the year must be our Queen, and her eldest daughter, the Empress Frederick of Germany, and President McKinley. Italy has lost Signor Crispi, China Li Hung-chang, and Afghanistan a liberal-minded Ameer. Our friends in India have had to mourn the loss of Mr. Justice Ranade, Judge of the High Court in Bombay; and in Japan the cause of enlightened culture has suffered a great loss in Mr. Fukuzawa. Liberal Protestantism in France is poorer by the death of Professor Auguste Sabatier, and M. Etienne Coquerel, editor of Le Protestant. The death of the three English bishops—Creighton, Stubbs, and Westcott—we have already recorded. The Church has also lost two Broad Churchmen in Brooke Lambert and H. R. Haweis. Of musicians there have died Verdi, Piatti, and Sir John Stainer; of artists, Kate Greenaway; of men of letters, F. W. H. Myers, Henry Septimus Sutton, Walter Besant, and Robert Buchanan, also Miss Charlotte Yonge. With these may be mentioned George Smith, of the firm of Smith, Elder and Co., always to be remembered as the projector and publisher of the "Dictionary of National Biography," Evelyn Abbott, of Balliol College, Oxford, and Professor John Fiske. At the great age of 108, Mrs. Elizabeth Hanbury, of Richmond, a fellow-worker with Elizabeth Fry, at last fell asleep.

From the roll of our ministers we have lost the Revs. William Binns, James Black, John Byles, C. L. Corkran, and S. Fletcher Williams; of other friends well known in the community of our churches, Mrs. Brooke Herford, Miss J. Durning Smith, Mrs. T. Chatfeild Clarke, Mrs. Luccock, and Mrs. Joseph Lupton, William Blake of Bridge, H. W. Meade-King, John Troup, J. Holme Nicholson, G. L. Bristow, Henry Rendall, H. E. Blazeby of Norwich, and many others.

I DO not know what life may mean beyond this earthly goal,
I only feel that now and here the spirit
has control;
That, if our lives are true and deep in this restricted sphere,
For what the future has in store we may not have a fear.—A. E. Locke.

BIRKENHEAD STONE-LAYING.

ON Saturday afternoon, Dec. 14, a memorial stone of the new Unitarian Church in Bessborough-road, Birkenhead, was laid by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, President of the National Conference, whose uncle, the late Russell Carpenter, was the first minister of the congregation, from its establishment in 1851 until his removal to Halifax in 1856. Two years ago the original Charing Cross Church was sold, and the congregation have since met in the schoolroom in Bessborough-road, in front of which the new church is now being built. The plans show a fine Gothic building, which is to be of red Ruabon brick with stone dressings from the Heswall quarries. The roof is to be of Tilberthwaite slate, and it is hoped that the church will be opened next summer.

The proceedings, except for the actual stone-laying, took place in the schoolroom, the chair being taken by Mr. A. W. WILLMER, in the absence of Mr. Frederick Jevons, chairman of the congregation, through illness. Among those present were also the Rev. James Crossley, minister of the congregation, the Revs. W. J. Jupp, H. D. Roberts, A. E. Parry, and H. W. Hawkes, Messrs. W. B. Bowring, R. D. Holt, H. W. Gair, Charles Hibbert, Richard Robinson, and J. J. Talbot (the architect).

After an opening hymn, the CHAIRMAN gave an address, in which he offered a cordial welcome to Mr. Carpenter, and then spoke of the position of their congregation in Birkenhead, dwelling upon their principle of freedom, and protesting against the narrow-mindedness which shut them out from fellowship with the other churches of the town. Looking back on the records of their church he found their faith had been borne out in deeds, and had given fine characters, both men and women, to the public life of the community. Their numbers had not increased during the fifty years of their congregational life, although the population of Birkenhead had been doubled. In future their church would be better situated, and he hoped they would make real progress. In conclusion, he stated that the proceeds of the sale of their old church by no means covered the cost of the new building, and they still had £400 to raise. He hoped that by unity of effort and steadfastness of purpose the congregation in its new house would grow and prosper and spread the living faith.

The architect then presented a silver trowel to Mr. Carpenter, who proceeded to lay the memorial-stone, and a prayer of dedication was offered by the Rev. J. Crossley, after which the company returned to the schoolroom.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER said that with faith and prayer they had laid the foundation-stone of their new church, and he offered them his sympathy in their new work. Looking back upon the half-century of their congregational life it was natural to ask what were the lessons they carried with them from the old church to the new, and with what hopes and intentions were they preparing to dedicate their new house of prayer? They bore with them a precious heritage of hours of worship, the recollection of public service, and the remembrance of purposes that had been cherished and strengthened by the religious fellowship of their old house of prayer. But besides the personal memories of the last fifty years there were remembrances of many events and incidents in the history of their religious communion, controversies which had raged and died away, institutions which had been founded, endeavours which had sprung up amongst them for the nourishment of a richer, fuller life, not the least significant of which was the National Conference he had the honour to represent. Passing from this limited field they might ask, what in the larger current of the national life of religious thought and endeavour had been gathered by the church in its old house of prayer to bear with it to the new. Three great influences might be noted. In the first place, the last half-century had witnessed an extraordinary development of that mode of thought and investigation to which they gave the general name of science. Everyone could recall from the last fifty years incidents of what used to be described as the conflict between science and religion, in which there had been, unhappily, on the part of the churches so many discreditable episodes. The Unitarians, at least, had never closed their doors to the newest truth. They, in their old church, had learned from time to time the full significance for their religion of that rising glow of light and truth which had come to them through the paths of science. With their principles of liberty, truth and religion, they had been able to maintain a fearless front against the scientists' method of attack, and now science in turn was becoming deeply imbued with the spirit of religion. Not only had there been during the last half-century a vast extension of their knowledge through the methods of physical sciences, but the same processes of inquiry, the same principles of investigation had been applied to the historical records of their faith, and they had seen a wholly new view of the Bible steadily grow up under the influence of the methods of scientific criticism. That had not destroyed the value of the Bible for them—it had enhanced its value tenfold, for it had shown them how from the crudest beginnings the Spirit of God brought forth larger truth, and how through the ages of the past one purpose ran, revealing with ever increasing clearness the mighty principles of God's government of the world. From another side this conviction had increased enormously as they had seen religion after religion brought before their view. No longer, after the old fashion, could they divide the world between Christians on the one hand and Jews, Turks, and infidels on the other. They knew now that beside the gleaming Nile, or in the broad valley of the two rivers of Mesopotamia, or under the shadow of the Himalaya peaks, there were taught thousands of years ago truths of the moral and spiritual life which were analogous to those which they rejoiced to hold to-day. This century was sometimes politically described as the age of the resurrection of nationalities, but it might also be called the age of the resurrection of religions. The Spirit of God was confined to no one race, it was in no single person's keeping, it lay not within the limits of any given book, but always and everywhere through the round earth God had been training and teaching the human race as the children of His love. When this was applied to the interpretation of Christianity it had tended more and more to disengage the essentials of the teaching of Jesus Christ from the accretions of the imagination. The Churches were learning, little by little, that they must go back to the fountain head to find the significance of Christianity in the spirit and the life of Christ. Whatever might be the relations of a temporary kind between the members of that Unitarian Church and the representatives of the great orthodox Churches round about them they should not be disheartened, for there were signs that a larger and broader view was spreading everywhere. They had but to open the hymn-books of the various denominations to discover that they were at least not afraid of singing Unitarian hymns, and when once their utterances of devotion were admitted into the sanctity of their worship the basis of religious fellowship was securely laid. It might be true that they would have to fight a certain recrudescence of the sacerdotalist and the hierarchic spirit, and it was always true that on the other side they had to fight the forces of worldliness, indifference, apathy, and passion; but though there might be sometimes lapses and discouragements, though some of them had been sorely tried by the manifestations of a temper in the country, during the last two years, which they hoped the Churches had succeeded in laying to rest, as soldiers of God they ought not to lose heart. Faith in the cause of purity, righteousness, and love was always deeper than any temporary darkenings of ignorance, indifference, and sin. Therefore he hailed with inexpressible gladness the many signs, during the period of the life of their own Church, of a rising sense of the need of righteousness to control all public affairs. The Church must be the leader in the great causes of temperance and purity. It was to the Church they must look, not for the details of the great social reconstruction towards which they were slowly advancing, but to prepare the hearts of men for the sacrifice which such reconstruction might entail. The Churches were leading the way slowly and with painful steps, sometimes with halting and undue deliberation, but they were leading the way in the idea that the essence of Christianity lay in the service of men, and that the dedication of all men as sons of the Heavenly Father demanded that all should have the best opportunities that social order could secure for the fulfilment of the free and spiritual life. These were some of the lessons they bore with them from their old sanctuary into the new. He congratulated them with the utmost sincerity on the enterprise to which they had set their hands, and prayed that the Church might be guided into a richer and more fruitful life.

Mr. W. B. BOWRING expressed the sympathy of the various Liverpool congregations with the Birkenhead Church, and the Rev. W. J. JUPP, also expressed the hope that there might be in future closer relations of fellowship between them. Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON proposed, and Miss COOKE seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Carpenter, and, he having responded, the proceedings terminated.

THE TARGUMS.

SIR,—Your readers may feel, in face of Mr. Manning's letter in your last issue, that my estimate of his address needs some justification. I therefore beg space for a few observations.

My review dealt with two chief points: the antiquity of the Targums and their authority for the text of the Old Testament, and the positiveness with which Mr. Manning stated some matters that are debatable. With regard to the first of these points, I said that Mr. Manning gave to the Targums an antiquity which they could not, as I thought, be shown really to deserve, and that his views rested on certain theories which are no longer to be found in scientific works on the Old Testament. His right to those views I did not, of course, deny. But since at present certain critical conclusions with regard to the post-exilic period are in almost entire possession of the field of Old Testament scholarship, it seemed to me curious that Mr. Manning should reproduce certain views of the origins of the Targums which are not in harmony with those critical conclusions; and that he should do this without any special defence, or any explanation, or any apparent consciousness that the views he puts forward are now, rightly or wrongly, regarded as discredited. And so I stated in my review that he might have supplied, at least in the printed form of the address, some indication of the evidence on which he relies in these matters, as against the ordinary critical standpoint. But not even now, in the letter in which he deals at some length with my review, does he produce any of the evidence which might substantiate his position. Instead, he tells us again that the Jews came home from Babylon with a knowledge of Aramaic, without any reference to the fact that it is now known that the Aramaic of the Bible is not Babylonian, and that it was acquired not in Babylon but in Palestine; he offers no explanation of his doctrine that the Targums represent traditional interpretations of the Old Testament from the time of Ezra, though I stated specially in my review that this can be true at the utmost only of the Targums in the Pentateuch, and that in any case the view is not tenable in presence of the fact that writings which were certainly not intended only for the learned class continued to be produced for at least two centuries after the time of Ezra, in a language which is still Hebrew And so, failing any indication from Mr. Manning, I can only conclude that his evidence consists of that body of Jewish tradition, which is "disposed to ascribe everything to Ezra, which it has not the assurance to refer to Moses," and state that those traditions are the starting point, and not the refutation, of the critical position.

With regard to the value of the Targums for the textual criticism of the Old Testament, I can only submit that Mr. Manning puts himself outside of any serious discussion, not only by the use which he makes of them in his Address, but also by the open admission in his letter, and the proof he there furnishes, that he does not understand the familiar technical term, "collusive witnesses." But, to justify my review to your readers, I may here state that whatever were the actual circumstances in which the Targums originated, they have come down to us in forms which are based on, or have been accommodated to, the Massoretic text; and that to count them as an additional witness to that text in cases where independence cannot be either demonstrated, or reasonably suspected, is a mistake. Mutatis mutandis, the same thing is true of the Syriac and the Vulgate versions of the Old Testament.

The other point may be shortly dismissed. I said that in some things I thought Mr. Manning was unduly positive. The examples I gave were his statement that there was no such person as Onqelos, and that no subjective improvement can be admitted into the text of the Old Testament unless it is supported by the early documents. With regard to the former example, the evidence is so conflicting that three different interpretations are open, each of which has found distinguished advocates. To affirm, without hesitation or qualification, only one of these interpretations may, I think, be fairly described as undue positiveness. The second example requires that we must accept certain parts of the Old Testament as hopelessly corrupt—which is a theory of despair—or believe that no error ever took place in its transmission without leaving documentary evidence—which is a theory of special miracle. Neither alternative is accepted by the majority of textual critics in any department of literature; and, therefore, even if it were in itself a defensible view, the assertion of it without qualification or hesitation may, I think, be fairly described as undue positiveness.

It only remains that I should explain why I mentioned Deutsch. Mr. Manning acknowledges his obligations to the well-known essay on the Targums by this author, published originally in 1863. On page 8 of Mr. Manning's Address will be found the statement that the Targumic text underwent revision in Babylon at the beginning of the fourth century, whence it received the character of an authorised version. The clue to this statement, which is in disagreement even with the context on the same page of Mr. Manning's Address, and which cannot be true at a date when half the Targums were as yet unwritten, will be found on reference to Deutsch (Literary Remains, page 342), where Deutsch is writing about the Targum of Onqelos. In presence of a literary slip of this kind, I concluded that possibly Mr. Manning, in accepting the view that the origin of the Targums goes back to the time of Ezra, might, in a similar way, have misread Deutsch (Ibid, page 321). Even here again, while Mr. Manning disclaims the evidence there given, he still does not state what his own evidence is. Since, however, Mr. Manning did not thence derive his theories, I admit willingly that my remark about Deutsch was not relevant. I am pleased, however, that I made it, because it has earned for me Mr. Manning's warmest thanks, which it would be graceless in me not to acknowledge.

I regret the length of my letter; but I have written it under the impression that the readers of THE INQUIRER will prefer evidence rather than personalities.

CHRISTMAS, 1901.

SIR,—The almost unrelieved gloom of your Christmas article, apropos of the South African situation, is surely overdone, and, therefore, somewhat hard on your readers. At Christmas time, of all others, we may fairly dwell on the other side of the shield, on the brighter aspects which certainly do exist, and rejoice in the strong hope many of us have, that the ultimate result of this terrible war may, in the hands of an all-wise Providence, be entirely good for mankind. Fighting is nearly over; the concentration camps are being seriously taken in hand; many burghers have already surrendered and are working with us to bring about a settlement; a certain appeasement of feeling is making itself evident on both sides. In Cape Colony the civil war is nearing its end. Anyone who honestly compares the situation existing this Christmas with that at last Christmas or the Christmas before cannot fail to be struck with the change for the better; indeed, the end of the war seems almost in view.

When one is inclined to take a despairing view of things, there is no sounder plan than to call up one's historical mind and dwell on the great events of the past which may seem to bear on the questions at issue; they will not fail to give us a firmer trust in the future. Take such great historical facts as the making of England; the Civil War in America, resulting in the overthrow of the South and the consolidation of the United States into the freest and most prosperous nation the world has yet seen; the establishment of the modern German Empire and the consolidation of the great German people into one of the great Powers of the world. None of these great events have been accomplished without pain and suffering which no man can measure; and yet now, looking back, though we cannot explain the pain and the suffering, we see that the result has been good.

We are now witnessing the making of South Africa, and whilst, as is right, we deeply feel the pain and the suffering, we may comfort ourselves by trusting that out of it all will arise at no very distant day a happy and united state which shall take its place amongst the great and prosperous commonwealths of the world, and that in future years, generations to come will see that here also the result has been good.

MORE DIFFICULTIES IN BRUSSELS.

SIR,—I have just received news which has none of the joyfulness of Christmas tidings, as it protracts the legal contention which has been forced upon our Church. The second action brought against us by the town has, after a weary delay, come before the Court of First Instance, and the judgment has been entirely in our favour. We reasonably hoped that this new defeat would determine the town to give way and accept the decision of the State with regard to our recognition as a Protestant Church. But the principal counsel for the town has recommended that the case should be carried before the Court of Appeal, and the committee on affairs in litigation has endorsed his recommendation.

I write with a feeling of great disappointment, almost of discouragement. The continuance of the struggle prolongs our financial troubles. For the present year, if we could use the £48 due to us for the minister's house-rent, and which the town disputes, we should be able to balance our accounts. As matters stand we cannot make up the deficiency; and all that is left to us is to turn once more to our friends in England, hoping that their kind help will be as persevering as the attacks of our opponents.

A word or two on our religious work. We have just lost by death one of our faithful members at Ghent, an eminent professor of civil law, Mr. Sérésia. His funeral gave me the opportunity of addressing a large gathering of professors, students, barristers and others, and of testifying to the religious and liberal Christian beliefs of our deceased friend. Our class for young people at Ghent has lately received the welcome addition of a dozen lads, of Catholic origin, who are sent to us, with their parents' consent, by the director of a large Institute.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY SOUTHEND HOLIDAY HOME.

SIR,—Will you permit me to call attention through your columns to the desire of the Committee of Management of the Holiday Home to extend the advantages of the Home to any friends who might be inclined to pay week-end visits to Southend during the winter and spring, when, it is believed, many persons would be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity of a brief change and rest during the quiet season.

Half-week fees are charged for these week-end visits, and I shall be glad to send full particulars upon application.

The Committee are most anxious to make the Home—the generous gift of Mrs. Bayle Bernard—widely known, so that the utmost use may be made of it, not only during the summer months, but all the year round.

G. W. OLDLAND, Local Hon. Sec.
Piccadilly, Westcliff, Southend-on-Sea, Dec. 19.

I THINK we have much to answer for, so far as the impression of our gospel upon the world is concerned. We have been content so often to suppose that a pulpit essay could be a word of life. It was only extreme unction for a dying congregation. Now I do not mean written sermons. It is quite possible to write a sermon as though you believed it, and it is possible still to preach it in a grand way. Nobody illustrated that better than Phillips Brooks, and many another man of our own communion actually, as he was sympathetically and spiritually. But, in the main, people want to have things driven home.—Thomas R. Slicer.

AN OLD PURITAN.

THE first minister of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, an early Puritan place of worship in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, long since included in the city itself, was Richard Mather, a Lancashire man, who in middle life crossed the Atlantic, and made for himself a place of some distinction in the early history of New England. He was the father of Increase, and grandfather of Cotton Mather, who wrote the Magnalia Christi Americana: Ecclesiastical History of New England, 1620-1698, published in London in 1702.

It was in 1618 that Richard Mather entered on his ministry in Toxteth Park, and it is supposed that in that year the chapel, which came to be known as the Ancient Chapel, was originally built. Mather submitted to ordination by the Bishop of Chester, but this was afterwards a trouble to his conscience, for he became a thoroughly-convinced Congregationalist, and when, in 1634, he was silenced by the Archbishop of York's authority one of the counts against him was that in all the years of his ministry he had never once worn a surplice.

What the authorities in the neighbouring town of Liverpool thought on the subject of the surplice some years earlier may be seen from the following curious entries, being orders of the Port Moot, which had control of the Church of St. Nicholas:—

Oct. 25, 1610.—"Item, we agree that Mr. Waynewright shall weare the S^r^plus ev'y Sabothe and ev'y holiday at the tyme of Dyvine S^r^vice."

"Item that he shall weare the S^r^plus at all tymes that he shall meet any Corps, as well poore as riche."

October 26, 1612.—"We agree y^t^ the Clerke of the Church shall weare his Surplus and reade the first chapter in the body of the Churche, and lykewise shall cause his haier to be cut of a comly and seemely length in such decent maner as best befitteth a man in his place."—Picton's "Municipal Archives and Records." Liverpool, 1883, p. 196.

Some years later they would seem to have become less exacting, or, at any rate, more tolerant in respect to visiting clergy, for Mather himself was appointed one of the occasional preachers of a week-day sermon instituted in 1629.

Mather was thirty-nine when he left this country in 1635, sailing from Bristol to Boston, and settling as minister of the Church in Dorchester, Mass. (now a suburb of Boston). For thirty-four years he laboured there, and died in 1669. He was one of the editors of the old Bay Psalm Book, and drafted the "Cambridge Platform," which remained for so many years the basis of the New England Church policy. He was a doughty champion of the "Congregational way," among his controversial works being a reply to "Mr. Samuel Rutherford," who, as a Presbyterian, had entered the lists against the Independents.

"He was the pattern of all answerers in the world," said old Mr. Higginson, of Salem. His tone in controversy was quiet and friendly, not seeking to emphasise the differences over which they contended, "for I had rather bring prayers and tears," he said, in his reply to Rutherford, "for the quenching of such fires, than fuel or oil for the increasing thereof. For I believe there is more hope of doing good by solidity of argument with the spirit of meekness and love, than by sharp and tart language, the fruit of bitterness of spirit, wherein, for the most part, right of reason is wanting, the passions being there most vehement and stirring, where the intellectuals are most feeble and weak."

All later accounts of Mather are based on a little book published in 1670, at Cambridge, Mass., entitled "The Life and Death of that Reverend Man of God, Mr. Richard Mather, Teacher of the Church in Dorchester, in New England." The writer was a personal friend, who desired that his name should be withheld; but he had access to all Mather's papers and every means of accurate knowledge. There is a dedication by Increase Mather to the Church and inhabitants of Dorchester, giving these facts as to the author. This Life was reprinted in 1850, at Boston, for the Dorchester Antiquarian and Historical Society, together with the "Journal of Richard Mather, 1635," and forms No. 3 of the Society's Collections.

In this life we find the following description of Mather's preaching:—

"His way of preaching was plain, aiming to shoot his arrows not over his people's heads, but into their hearts and consciences. Whence he studiously avoided obscure phrases, exotic words, or an unnecessary citation of Latin sentences, which some men addict themselves to the use of. The Lord gave him an excellent faculty in making abstruse things plain, that in handling the deepest mysteries he would accommodate himself to vulgar capacities, that even the meanest might learn something.

"He was mighty in the Scriptures—whence Mr. Hooker would say of him, 'My brother Mather is a mighty man.' Also, his usual way of delivery was very powerful, awakening and zealous, especially in his younger years, there being few men of so great strength of body as he, which, together with his natural fervour of spirit, being sanctified, made his ministry the more powerful. And the Lord went forth with his labours to the conversion of many, both in England and in New England."

In his grandson Cotton's "Magnalia," there is preserved a paper drawn up by Richard Mather, June 21, 1633, containing a number of resolutions which he had made for the guidance of his own life, and earnestly renewed, after his settlement in New England, when the paper was again dated, June 15, 1636. Here we get an additional glimpse into the character of the man, who was "exceeding low and little in his own eyes," and from whom, even amid the changed conditions of the present time, ministers may yet have something to learn:—

I.—Touching the Ministry.

To be more painful and diligent in private preparations for preaching, by reading, meditation and prayer; and not slightly and superficially.

In and after preaching, to strive seriously against inward pride and vain-glory.

Before and after preaching, to beg by prayer the Lord's blessing on his word for the good of souls more carefully than in the past.

II.—Touching the Family.

To be more frequent in religious discourse and talk.

To be more careful in catechising children. And, therefore, to bestow some pains this way every week once; and, if by urgent occasions it be sometimes omitted, to do it twice as much another week.

III.—Touching Myself.

To strive more against worldly cares and fears and against the inordinate love of earthly things.

To be more frequent and constant in private prayer.

To practise more carefully and seriously and frequently the duty of self-examination, especially before receiving the Lord's supper.

To strive against carnal security and excessive sleeping.

To strive against vain jangling and misspending precious time.

IV.—Touching Others.

To be careful and zealous to do good unto their souls by private exhortation, reproofs, instruction, conferences of God's word.

To be ready to do offices of love and kindness, not only or principally for the praise of men, to purchase commendation for a good neighbour, but rather out of conscience to the commandment of God.

OBITUARY.

H. E. BLAZEBY, NORWICH.

THE Octagon Chapel has sustained another severe loss through the death of Henry Edward Blazeby, who passed away on Sunday last, Dec. 22, after a long and painful illness. He was born at Norwich on July 4, 1836, and was the younger brother of the Rev. William Blazeby, B.A. As a lad he came with many other successful Norwich citizens under the influence of John Withers Dowson, who had almost a unique power of perceiving and developing the best that was in young people. He served the Norwich Union Fire Society for thirty-seven years, and was head of its Foreign Department for twenty years. Here he showed great powers of administration, and opened important branches of its work in distant countries. During his tenure of office this department extended its operations to almost every part of the civilised world, and its business increased fifteen-fold. This work was one of his greatest pleasures, and he devoted himself to it with entire self-forgetfulness, often being at his desk through the greater portion of the night. He was frequently warned against this by his friends, but always in his merry way boasted of his inexhaustible constitutional strength. After a severe illness two and a half years ago the directors, being anxious to show their esteem and gratitude for his faithful service, suggested that he should retire and offered him a handsome pension. The staff enthusiastically took this opportunity to show their respect for him, and to express their admiration of his kindly management and his extraordinary business capacity. In politics he was a Liberal and took an active and leading part in the work of the Liberal Association of his district. He received the Long Service Medal as a Volunteer of the Norfolk Regiment. He was passionately attached to the Octagon Chapel, to which he was a most liberal subscriber, and on whose Committee he served for many years. And he always took the keenest interest in the welfare of our denomination. Since 1886 he held the office of Treasurer to the Eastern Counties Union, and sometimes in devotion to its work attended its meetings at great personal risk. He had a quaint and pleasing humour, under which was hidden an intense inner earnestness. He carried this with him into his business transactions, and occasionally revealed it during his last illness, when in the greatest agony. His genial manner won friends for him wherever he went, and his generosity and unstinted giving caused him to be beloved by many of the poor of our chapel and of his own district. All who knew him will miss a warm-hearted and cheerful friend. He leaves a widow, two sons, and two daughters. A. H.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Blackley.—On Saturday, Dec. 7, a Sale of Work, Tea, and Entertainment, arranged by the Ladies' Sewing Societies, in aid of the new school fund, was held. The sale realised £25. On Saturday, Dec. 21, the annual recital in connection with the Sunday-school took place, and was a complete success. The children and the senior scholars each performed a play, the rest of the programme consisting of tableaux, action songs, a humorous sketch, and a recitation. On Sunday, Dec. 22, the Rev. W. Holmshaw preached a "Peace Sermon" in the morning. In the evening a programme of Christmas music, well rendered by the choir, with the assistance of Miss Harling, of Strangeways Church, took the place of the sermon.

Chichester.—On Sunday morning last a service was held for children and young people. At the close the Sunday scholars each received a seasonable gift. In the evening the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott preached an impressive sermon on "Peace."

Deal.—On Saturday last we had a Christmas tree for the children, preceded by a tea, given by Mrs. Shakspeare. The gifts on the tree were the work of the Sewing Circle, and they were bestowed on children attending the weekly class and Sunday services. A programme of seasonable hymns, songs, and recitations was gone through. Our thanks are due to Miss Chapman, Miss Batchelor, Mr. Boyle, and Mrs. Shakspeare for kind help on the occasion.

Raloo: co. Antrim.—On Thursday evening, 19th ult., a successful soirée was held in the Remonstrant Church, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion. After tea, and a hymn by the choir, the chair was taken by the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin (pastor loci), and a miscellaneous programme of music and readings was gone through. The Rev. John Miskimmin (Grey Abbey) addressed the meeting, and proposed a cordial vote of thanks to all those who had given any assistance. A hymn and benediction brought the proceedings to a close.

Torquay.—A very interesting and well-attended lecture, with lantern views, was given on 2nd inst., at Unity Hall, by Dr. G. Black, on the absorbing subject of "Dartmoor." The last concert of the autumn session was given on 16th inst., and included Edward Elgar's "Sabbath Morn at Sea," given by voice and orchestra, and Hummel's Piano forte Concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra. The whole series of lectures and concerts have been very successful, and have given much satisfaction.

York.—On Dec. 22 a Peace meeting was held by the Friends in York after their ordinary evening meeting for worship. Mr. Joseph Rowntree took the chair, and the invited speakers included a Primitive Methodist minister, an active Wesleyan layman, and a member of the School Board, a Labour member of the Town Council, and the Rev. H. Rawlings. There was a large and earnest audience.

IN the corrupted currents of this world
Offence's gilded hand may shove by justice; but 'tis not so above.
There is no shuffling, there the action lies
In its true nature; and we ourselves compelled,
Even to the teeth and forehead of our faults,
To give in evidence.—Shakespeare.

NEW BOOK BY MISS FRANCES E. COOKE.

The Story of St. Francis of Assisi

By FRANCES E. COOKE, author of "Story of Dorothea Dix," "Story of John Greenleaf Whittier," &c. Cloth gilt, 1s. net, postage 2d.

"My aim in preparing this little history of St. Francis of Assisi has been to introduce young people to the story of one who was devoted to the carrying out of a great ideal—the realisation of a Christ-like life. That he tried to imitate literally the deeds of Christ does not mar the beauty of his character, or diminish the worth of his example for us. Perhaps now, more than ever, we need the kindling influence of great aims and lofty ideals, and it would surely be well for ourselves and for the world about us if we were to try to carry the spirit of St. Francis into our daily lives."—From Preface.
